Police to do a Basilan in Metro Manila

Crackdown on kidnappers, 'kotong' cops

4 more Abus fall in Basilan

BY JULIET L. JAVELLANA AND TONETTE OREJAS

THE CRACKDOWN on Abu Sayyaf members and supporters in the South will be replicated by the Philippine National Police, this time on kidnapping-for-ransom syndicates in Metro Manila.

President Macapagal-Arroyo yesterday gave PNP Director General Leandro Mendoza "strong marching orders" to focus on kidnapping syndicates and kotong (mulcting) cops in the next two weeks.

"(Mendoza) said there would be a similar version of the (Armed Forces') offensives against the Abu Sayyaf in the next two weeks. They will be producing results, there will be arrests," Rigoberto Tiglao, spokesperson for the President, told reporters after a lengthy Cabinet meeting yesterday.

Tiglao said there would be no warrantless arrests because the police had built a dossier on the kidnapping-for-ransom syndicates that had been under surveillance for the past two months.

"(The police) said this would be a renewed offensive... They have pinpointed certain kidnapping gangs and they expect major arrests in the next two weeks," he said.

"There would be no (zoning), just an equivalent of what is being done in Basilan, which means they will be arresting people against whom they have built a lot of intelligence data," he added.

As though to set the tone, intelligence agents arrested four Indians, all suspects in three cases involving a large kidnapping-for-ransom syndicate in Central Luzon, in separate operations in Tarlac and Pampanga last week.

ISABELA CITY, Basilan—Four more suspected Abu Sayyaf members and supporters were separately arrested on Monday, bringing to 37 the total number of persons apprehended in the province since the government launched its crackdown on the bandit group last week.

Maj. Alberto Gepilano, civil-military operations officer Of the Joint Task Force Comet, said the four were undergoing tactical interrogation at the 103rd Army Brigade headquarters here.

In Davao City, Armed Forces spokesperson Brig. Gen. Edilberto Adan said military men coddling the Abu Sayyaf would be the next target.

Adan said members of the Philippine National Police were among those earlier arrested in the crackdown. "Of the 54 arrested Abu Sayyaf supporters, some are policemen. Then we will go to the military," he said.

In Manila, President Macapagal-Arroyo assured the people that the Abu Sayyaf would be dismantled "in a matter of time."

"I know that progress in... Basilan and Sulu can only come if we destroy the enemies of peace and order. The Abu Sayyaf and their cohorts are the Filipino people's enemy," the President said in a speech at yesterday's conferment rites of Class 36, Master in National Security Administration, of the National Defense College of the Philippines in Malacañang.

Peso tumbles to 53.95 against the US dollar

BY CLARISSA S. BATINO

THE PESO yesterday tumbled to 53.95 against the US dollar, its lowest level under the Macapagal administration, amid calls for the central bank to intervene aggressively to check the slide.

Banko Sentral ng Pilipinas Governor Rafael Buenaventura, however, ruled out intervention and raising interest rates as options to defend the peso.

Analysts said the BSP had little choice but to let the peso fall given the formidable array of domestic and external forces ranged against the local currency, like the Basilan hostage crisis, budget deficit and fears of repercussions from Argentina's financial crisis.

The peso hit an intra-day low of 53.955 against the US dollar on the spot market. Volume remained light at $49.5 million, down from $50.4 million on Monday when the peso closed at 53.71.

Senate, House still squabbling on leadership

BY JULIET JAVELLANA, ARMAND N. NOCUM AND ROCKY NAZARENO

DISTRESSING is the state of both Houses of Congress five days before it opens on Monday.

There are four unyielding aspirants in the ruling People Power Coalition (PPC) for the presidency of the Senate. The standoff could split the coalition wide open giving the opposition party the opportunity to seize the top post.

The same thing could happen in the Lower House where top officials of two parties allied with the PPC are contending for the speakership: Rep. Florencio Abad, president of the Liberal Party, and Rep. Jose de Venecia, secretary general of Lakas-NUCD, the party of President Macapagal-Arroyo.

This may be why despite her insistence not to interfere in the leadership fight in Congress, President Macapagal will meet with the contentious candidates before the 12th Congress opens.

Presidential spokesperson Rigoberto Tiglao said in a radio interview yesterday that the President remains confident the administration bets will make it.

The President herself may have added to the

Gov't agents arrest 2 alleged ABB leaders

BY CARLITO PABLO

TWO SUSPECTED leaders of a communist splinter group reportedly allied with deposed President Joseph Estrada were arrested last Monday in Quezon City for allegedly planning to sow disorder during President Macapagal-Arroyo's State of the Nation Address (Sona) on July 23.

Army chief Lt. Gen. Jaime de los Santos identified the two as Danilo Singh, alleged national commander of the urban hit squad Alex Boncayao Brigade (ABB) and secretary of the Partido Marxista-Leninista ng Pilipinas (PMLP), and Rolando Marcelo, alleged head of the PMLP's education department.

Singh is also known as Roland and Bombay while Marcelo is known as Joel, according to the Army chief.

Sources said Singh and Marcelo were arrested because PMLP was allegedly joining rallies of the sup-

No budget for 2002 in GMA 'Sona'

BECAUSE of the financial jitters, President Macapagal-Arroyo will not be able to submit the proposed budget for next year to the 12th Congress when it opens on Monday, Budget Secretary Emilia Boncodin yesterday said.

The President is scheduled to deliver her first State of the Nation Address (Sona) before the joint session of the Senate and the House of Representatives on July 23.

"We cannot submit a budget proposal for the Sona because we do not want to be in a hurry. Because of these financial jitters, we want to submit a very realistic budget," Boncodin said in a radio interview.

Boncodin said she told Ms Macapagal that the budget proposal could be submitted two weeks after the Sona.

The budget secretary said that under the law, the budget proposal could be submitted one month after the opening of the regular session of Congress.

Boncodin said the Ramos administration was able to submit a

Gloria unfazed by Loi's phone

BY JULIET L. JAVELLANA

PRESIDENT Macapagal-Arroyo was so busy crafting her first major speech that she hardly paid attention to the reported "Gloria Labandera" ringing tone of new Sen. Luisa "Loi" Ejercito Estrada's cellphone.

"She's not angry about it," her spokesperson Rigoberto Tiglao said.

Tiglao reiterated that the President takes no offense at being called Gloria, the laundry woman, because her paternal grandmother was actually one.

"In fact, she was really happy that a soap manufacturer gave her samples of the Gloria Labandera soap. She's not ashamed that her grandmother is a laundry woman," Tiglao added.

He was referring to the new soap manufactured by Unilever in her honor. The soap would probably form part of the relief goods the President and her cabinet would distribute to the poor.

Ejercito's favorite ringing tone was revealed when her cellphone rang as she was holding a press conference at the Senate.

Tiglao had said the President had been reaching out to opposition senators because she is the President of all.

BY CATHY C. YAMSUAN

ALLIED people's organizations yesterday asked the Supreme Court to stop the implementation of the new Power Reform Law saying it was unconstitutional.

In a 35-page supplemental petition, the groups, led by the Bagong Alyansang Makabayan and Bayan Muna, said the plan to restructure and privatize the National Power Corp. was a "flagrant violation" of the Constitution.

The petition, drafted by the Public Interest Law Center, said Republic Act 9136, or the Electric Power Industry Reform Act of 2001, would favor giant electricity monopolies owned and operated by the Lopez and Aboitiz families.

The petitioners fear that consumers would bear the burden of increasing electricity costs once Napocor is privatized and the energy industry deregulated.

They also expressed concern over the dislocation of Napocor employees.

Even before RA 9136 was passed, the Napocor Employees Union had filed a petition questioning the restructuring and dislocation of employees of the government corporation.

RA 9136 provides for the sale of Napocor's generation and supply sectors to private investors, while retaining regulation of its transmission and distribution sectors.

The people's organizations questioned Sections 28 and 45 of RA 9136

"insofar as they tend to perpetuate monopoly control of the energy industry and violate the equal protection clause and anti-monopoly provisions of the Constitution as stated in its Article XII Section 19."

They charged that Section 28 in particular, was "intended to benefit" big distribution facilities, including the Metro Manila-based Manila Electric Co., Davao Light and Power Co., Cotabato Light and Power Co., and San Fernando Light and Power Co.

They said these distribution utilities were "identified with some of the most powerful families in the country with ties to the principal sponsors of the law."

The Lopez family owns Meralco while the (other) three huge distribution utilities are owned by the Aboitiz family.

The groups said the law discriminates against small distribution utilities, singling them out for "de-monopolization and shareholding dispersal" as well as subjecting them to other restrictions, while big distribution utilities, holding companies and controlling shareholders of listed companies are shielded from such measures.

They added that the law also discriminates against entities engaged in transmission and distribution which, unlike those engaged in the generation and supply of electricity, are subject to the franchise requirement rule and rate-fixing regulations.

The groups argued that power generation and supply are by nature public utilities.

But in exempting public utilities from the franchise requirement, RA 9136 violated Article XII Section 11 of the Constitution, they said.

Another constitutional violation involves RA 9136's allowing private entities, including foreign corporations, to directly engage in hydro- and geothermal power generation, the groups said.

The generation of hydro- and geothermal power in Philippine territory, which involved the "development or utilization of natural resources," cannot be undertaken by individuals or corporations except through co-production, joint venture or production sharing agreement with the state in accordance with Article XII, Section 2 of the Constitution, they said.

The government had promised residential end rate reductions of 30 per kilowatt hour once the law was passed.

It also promised a socialized pricing mechanism called a lifeline rate for marginalized consumers.

The groups noted that "marginalized" has not been clearly established under the law, along with the computation of the lifeline rate.

The government is poised to absorb a portion of Napocor's financial obligations, amounting to not more than P200 billion.

But since Napocor's privatization would result in P352 billion in net stranded costs, the government's target selling price of $4.5 billion would not be enough to cover debts amounting to $6.7 billion, the groups warned.

Power producers seek fair rules

THE CONTROVERSIAL Power Reform Law will be effective in implementing reforms in the power sector only if the government comes up with fair and acceptable implementing rules and regulations for consumers and industry players.

This is the position of the country's independent power producers (IPPs), which supply more than half of the country's power requirements.

David Tan, president of the Philippine Independent Power Producers Association (PIPPA), said that while IPPs are encouraged by government efforts to solve the problems of the industry, the government should immediately address critical issues in implementing the power bill to fully realize the benefits of privatization and power deregulation.

The recently enacted Omnibus Power

Act calls for the privatization of the cash-strapped National Power Corp. as part of the restructuring of reforms to be implemented in the industry.

Tan, in a press statement, cited the following critical areas under the power bill that must be attended to immediately:

- To set up acceptable implementing rules and regulations.
- To establish the terms of reference on Napocor's asset tenders/biddings.
- To design spot market rules to ensure real competition in power rate setting.
- To ensure the integrity, competence, independence and judiciousness of the Energy Regulatory Commission (ERC).

Tan said IPPs are further encouraged by the government's demonstrated adherence to the terms of the build-operate-transfer contracts, which will be looked at favorably when IPPs decide on where to invest in Asia and the Third World.

Another area of concern with IPPs is whether the country's environmental clearance rules as implemented by the new leadership of the Department of Environment and Natural Resources will reflect a balanced, enlightened and realistic view of environmental protection and economic-industrial development, he said.

Tan said the country's policymakers must learn from the lessons of California which now suffers from crippling power outages, three-fold increase in power rates and severe disturbances in business and social activities because of the failure of IPPs to receive environmental clearances for new power plants for almost 10 years.

Ping's men called to Dacer probe

TWO ranking officers of the defunct Presidential Anti-Organized Crime Task Force have been ordered to appear in the Department of Justice's on-going preliminary investigation in the abduction and murder of publicist Salvador "Bubby" Dacer.

Senior Superintendents Michael Ray Aquino and Cesar Mancao, both aides of former PNP chief and now Sen. Panfilo Lacson, have been summoned to appear and submit their counter-affidavits in hearings set on July 27 and 31.

The subpoenas were issued Monday and were received by the two officers yesterday.

Also issued a subpoena was PO3 Larry Ambre who supposedly acted as Mancao's driver on the day the operation to abduct and kill Dacer was held.

Aquino and Mancao were named in the affidavit submitted by Supt.

Glenn Dumlaog who claimed he once overheard the two discuss the plan to take Dacer.

Dumlaog said he was personally tasked by Aquino to conduct a surveillance job on Dacer, and to file documents in the publicist's office at the Manila Hotel before destroying it.

Meanwhile, sources at the DOJ alleged that Mancao ordered Ambre to drive for him that day since his original driver is a Bicolano. Dacer hailed from Bicol.

SC tells judge to explain Mark Jimenez bail

THE SUPREME Court has given Manila Judge Guillermo Purganan a 10-day "non-extendible" period that ends on July 27 to justify the P1-million bail he ordered Mark Jimenez to post in exchange for his temporary liberty.

The tribunal's order came after a petition for certiorari filed by the Department of Justice asking for a nullification of Purganan's bail order.

Purganan ordered Jimenez to post a P1-million bail after conducting a bail hearing sought by the congressman. Jimenez wanted a bail hearing held in court to establish whether he should be arrested prior to his extradition to the US.

Jimenez, who was recently elected Manila congressman, is wanted by the US government for mail fraud, tax evasion, issuing false statements, illegal contributions to the Democratic Party and conspiracy to defraud the US government.

The DOJ complained that Purganan readily allowed Jimenez to enjoy temporary liberty without the congressman indicating credible reasons for such.

The DOJ, through Undersecretary Mercedes Gutierrez, argued that the government should honor its extradition treaty with the US, adding that Jimenez might use his temporary liberty to flee to another country without such an agreement with the US.

The DOJ also expressed fears that Jimenez will only abuse his new status as a neophyte solon to escape extradition.

Once Purganan files his explanation, the SC said the DOJ should respond by Aug. 7. Oral arguments between Purganan and representatives of the DOJ have been set on Aug. 14.

Mike says he'll stay off Marcoses' cases

BY J. JAVELLANA

FIRST Gentleman Mike Arroyo yesterday said he would not become an intermediary in any talks involving the Marcos ill-gotten wealth.

Arroyo made the statement in denying for the second-day speculations arising from his meeting with Irene Marcos-Araneta's husband, Gregory, at a popular bar in Makati City.

"I don't want to be the intermediary, I don't want to be anything," Arroyo said in a radio interview.

Arroyo said that if the Marcoses wanted to make any overtures about the ill-gotten wealth, they should go directly to Presidential Commission on Good Government Chair Haydee Yorac.

"They should go to her, so that everything would be transparent for the people to see. Me, I don't even want to be involved in anything," he added.

Arroyo said they merely reminisced about the "good old days" when he, his first or second cousin Gregory and other cousins met in Conway's bar.

"We did not talk about any Marcos wealth. We were just talking about remembrances," he asserted.

Arroyo said Frank Chavez was being malicious when he told the media about the President and him being seen in a huddle with Gregory at Conway's.

He said they go to Conway's to listen to the Spirit of the '60s music. "One time, Gloria even joined us. Her classmates were also there... There were so many people, the place was filled with people.

We were all enjoying. Relaxation. We stayed for 30 minutes to one hour and then we went home," he said.

He did not say when. The First Gentleman said he grew up in the company of Gregory and other cousins.

Desierto asks Sandigan to censure Erap, lawyers

BY DONNA S. CUETO

OMBUDSMAN Aniano Desierto said yesterday he would ask the Sandiganbayan to censure ousted President Joseph Estrada and his defense lawyers for allegedly casting doubt on the integrity of the anti-graft court that is trying the case of plunder against the jailed leader.

Even the former first lady, and now senator, Loi Ejercito, and son Jinggoy Estrada, could be included in the censure motion if it can be proven that they, too, had issued statements seeking to "undermine the dignity of the court," Desierto said.

He said his staff was now checking the veracity of an INQUIRER report that quoted the elder Estrada as saying that he felt he was not being treated fairly by the Sandiganbayan.

Plunder law challenge

As this developed, the Supreme Court yesterday gave the Ombudsman 10 days to comment on a petition filed by Estrada alleging that the country's Plunder Law was unconstitutional.

Estrada's lawyers earlier questioned the legality of the plunder charges against their client, saying Estrada had not been properly notified of the exact charges that had been leveled against him.

The tribunal also gave Estrada and the Sandiganbayan 10 days to comment on a motion by the justice department asking the high court to reconsider its decision to bar live media coverage of the ex-president's trial.

In the INQUIRER report, Estrada had mainly lashed out at President Macapagal-Arroyo saying that she would be inclined to commute a death sentence on Estrada were he to be convicted on the plunder charges.

Estrada said this meant his conviction was imminent and that Ms Macapagal was conditioning the minds of the people to it.

Loi and Jinggoy were also reported to have commented on the issue in television interview.

"These statements of the accused and others related to the accused must be stopped. Otherwise, we shall ask this court to allow us to present our side, meaning we will present our evidence outside of the court," Desierto told the Sandiganbayan.

"If the former president made a statement that would undermine the dignity of this court, he should be included in our motion because he is an accused in this case," he said.

Insult to the court

Desierto said it was an insult to the court for the defense to say that it could be influenced by the President's statements.

He said that it was within the privilege of the President to say what she did since commuting death sentences was within her power.

He said the President's statements would have no bearing on the court.

But when asked what his unsolicited advice to the President would be, he said: "My advice is please not to talk about the case here in court because either way it would be interpreted against anybody."

Also yesterday, the Ombudsman opposed the defense's "manifestation on home visit and pension," saying that the 30-day "home visit" that Estrada's lawyers were asking for Estrada and his son so they could prepare for their trial was equivalent to a house arrest.

If this was granted, it would set a dangerous precedent for other detention prisoners, he said.

Adequate quarters

In his nine-page opposition, Desierto said that the Estradas' present quarters were adequate for them and their lawyers to pore over records and prepare for the Aug. 2 pre-trial.

"Many law offices do not enjoy the convenience of sufficient space, privacy, much more airconditioning. The accused have all these and much more in their detention quarters," he said.

He also commented on former justice secretary Serafin Cuevas acting as a lawyer for Estrada.

Desierto said that Cuevas could not lawyer for Estrada and receive a government pension at the same time. He quoted from the same law, Republic Act 910, that Justice Secretary Hernando Perez had cited.

"The obvious philosophy behind the law is as compelling as it is ancient: one may not bite the hand that feeds him," said Desierto.

The law states that "no retiring Justice during the time he is receiving said pension shall appear as counsel before any court in any civil case wherein the Government or any subdivision or instrumentality thereof is an adverse party, or in any criminal case wherein an officer or employee of the government is accused of an offense in relation to his office."

Desierto said that even if, as Cuevas has pointed out, he was not defending Estrada in a civil case, and that Estrada was no longer a government official, the civil aspect of the case was "impliedly instituted" in the plunder case.

He asked the Sandiganbayan to deny the manifestation with finality.

The manifestation was supposed to have been heard yesterday by the 3rd Division which is hearing the plunder case, but the defense lawyers asked to defer the hearing.

Gloria's statement

The defense instead submitted a "manifestation of grave concern" with the 3rd Division citing, among other things, the President's statement about the commutation of Estrada's possible death sentence.

"Maybe, she meant well but it is far from clear that she was being fair. If the magistrates who would finally rule on his case here or elsewhere have qualms over the death penalty, she in effect is signaling for them not to worry, she would not impose it," the manifestation read.

Also yesterday, the Office of the Ombudsman said it was abandoning its earlier position to have the Estrada father and son detained at Camp Crame.

Desierto said he had no objection to the Philippine National Police's position that the Estradas be returned to the detention bungalow at Fort St. Domingo in Sta. Rosa, Laguna.

"The continued and prolonged stay of the former president, who is physically fit, at the Veterans Memorial Medical Center inside a hospital suite, can be considered as special treatment which is anathema to the principle of equal protection and to adherence to the rule of law," Desierto said. *With a report from Cathy C. Graft court orders $9.5-M payment for sequestered jet

THE SANDIGANBAYAN yesterday ordered the release of $9.5 million from the Philippine National Bank to pay for the government's debt to an American firm that had bought an "erroneously" sequestered jet from the Presidential Commission on Good Government.

The money would be returned to Walter Fuller Aircraft Sales Inc., which bought the Falcon jet in September 1989 from the PCGG. The government earlier thought that the plane was owned by businessman Eduardo "Danding" Cojuangco Jr., and had sequestered it.

The government had earlier petitioned the Supreme Court to review the Sandiganbayan's refusal to release the funds placed in escrow to satisfy the terms of an agreement between the PCGG and Fuller Aircraft.

The PCGG has sequestered the plane from Cojuangco and sold it to Fuller Aircraft. It later turned out that while Cojuangco had been using the plane, it was really owned by a Hong Kong-based company, Faysound, which later won an ownership suit in Arkansas against Fuller Aircraft.

Fuller Aircraft, however, won a breach of contract case in a US bankruptcy court against the Philippine government which was asked to pay the aircraft company $16.4 million.

In 1996, the government and the US firm came to an agreement in which the Philippine indebtedness was reduced to $14 million, of which some $6.8 million has been paid.

The PCGG was able to convince Fuller to agree to installment payments.

Scrapping of regional wage boards sought

BY PHILIP C. TUBEZA AND AGNES E. DONATO

PROGRESSIVE party-list representatives in Congress yesterday vowed to work for the scrapping of regional wage boards as rival militant organizations stood united yesterday in denouncing Malacanang's advice for workers to seek economic relief from the wage boards.

Accusing the President of "calousness and unwillingness to help workers," Kilusang Mayo Uno chair Crispin Beltran said being told to go to the wage boards where petitions are always "reduced to almost nothing" was tantamount to a rejection of the workers.

Renato Magtubo of the Partido ng Manggagawa said the administration's response smacked of "elitist smugness" and compared it to Marie Antoinette's "let them eat cake" remark to the Parisian rabble.

Legislated hike

Beltran said that aside from filing a bill calling for the immediate legislation of a nationwide P125 across-the-board wage hike, he and two other Bayan Muna representatives, Satur Ocampo and Lisa Maza, would file legislation to scrap the wage boards.

Malacañang had urged the labor unions to lobby with the wage boards for a P125 across-the-board wage increase instead of pressuring the President to push for a legislated wage hike.

The regional wage boards were established in 1989 to set the wage levels appropriate for specific localities, the argument being that the economic situation differed among regions.

But Beltran argued that since their establishment, the wage boards have never granted a wage increase that is reflective of the actual needs and demands of the workers as "they only impose wage adjustments favoring capitalists."

Ocampo, the Bayan Muna president, said the wage adjustments granted by wage boards were never enough to cover the fast rising prices of commodities.

Ocampo urged the government to review its "framework" in looking at the issue of wage increases.

"The government is always quick to argue that the economy is bad and businesses could collapse if employers gave the wage increase that the workers are demanding," he said.

"But it never considers how it could be able to help the capitalists in their other problems such as high interest rates for their capital and high taxes for the importation of raw materials so that they could afford to increase the wage of their employees," he added.

Production boost

Ocampo argued that bigger wages could actually boost production, as this would mean increased purchasing power for the workers.

"If the workers have bigger incomes, they would be able to buy the products of local industry, thus increasing the rate of production," he said.

Bayan Muna and KNU were yesterday joined by the urban poor group Kalipunan ng Damayang Mahihirap (Kadamay) in calling for a P125 nationwide wage increase.

"I am very disappointed with the President," said Kadamay chairperson Mameng Deunida, a prominent figure in protest actions against ousted President Joseph Estrada.

But Deunida said she did not really expect much from Ms Macapagal.

Urban poor summit

"She never really knew how it felt to be poor. Nothing means more to her than business and the military," she said.

More than 700 urban poor leaders from Metro Manila, Central Luzon and Southern Tagalog attended an urban poor summit, which highlighted the sector's demand for jobs, a stop to all demolitions, housing and improved delivery of basic services.

Magtubo said that while his group understands the gravity of the problems that the President inherited from her predecessors, she should not abandon workers to the mercy of their employers.

"Workers do not seek a miracle from Gloria Macapagal-Arroyo. Her few months in Malacañang will not resolve a hundred years of poverty and destitution. What labor looks for is an ally in government—a President that champions the rights and welfare of the poor," he said.

The Partido ng Manggagawa will join Sanlakas to mobilize 20,000 people for the "People's Sona 2001" on Monday.

Wilson Fortaleza, Sanlakas president, said he was skeptical of the "war against poverty" that the President will reportedly announce in her state of the nation address.

Aside from the fact that GMA's heart beats not out of genuine concern for the masses but of real fear at another rebellion of the poor, our main critique of her so-called centerpiece program is that (it espouses) a trickle-down concept of poverty alleviation instead of a redistribution of wealth," Fortaleza said.

Capulong: I'm no crony's lawyer

BY BLANCHE S. RIVERA

DEFENDING his loyalty to human rights causes, lawyer Romeo Capulong yesterday said he was not defending a Marcos crony as implied by the Presidential Commission on Good Government.

Capulong, who also represents the Samahang mga Ex-Detinees Laban sa Detensyon at Para sa Amnitiya (Selda), said the PCGG had no right to question his loyalty to the victims of the rights abuses during the Marcos regime.

He said Don Ferry, one of the 22 defendants in the government's sequestration case against Lucio Tan and other Marcos associates, "is not a Marcos crony by any legal definition or stretch of the imagination."

"Being the lawyer of a decent Filipino technocrat who has been unfairly and falsely implicated in a PCGG case certainly does not conflict with my duties as a lawyer for the 10,000 human rights victims of the Marcos dictatorship," Capulong said in a statement.

Ferry, a former classmate and "good friend" of Capulong in the UP College of Law, is tagged in civil Case 0005 for the sequestration of shares in various companies controlled and held by Tan.

Ferry was the president of the Tan-controlled Maranaw Hotels and Resorts Corp. (MHRC) and vice president of the Development Bank of the Philippines from 1981-1984 during which the DBP's shares in the Century Park Sheraton Hotel, which was owned by MHRC, were sold.

PCGG Commission Ruben Carranza Jr. said he "did not mean to judge" Capulong's loyalty but was merely "surprised" that the lawyer also stood counsel to Ferry.

"I respect Attorney Capulong and his record of human rights advocacy," Carranza said. "The comments in reference to Don Ferry were merely a statement of surprise while I was reading the case."

He said the PCGG was in no position to ask Capulong to explain his professional loyalties and was even looking forward to helping the 9,539 Marcos victims claim indemnification.

The PCGG officials met with Capulong and other representatives of Selda, which includes majority of the rights claimants, last week to discuss how the PCGG could aid in the indemnification of the victims.

Carranza said it was even Capulong who suggested that PCGG initiate efforts to forge a working unity between the two rancorous claimants group, Selda and the Claimants 1081.

"As PCGG commissioner, I am still more than happy to accomplish that with Attorney Capulong," Carranza added.

Negotiating for 'jueteng' lord

BY ARMAND N. NOCUM

SILVESTRE Bello III, chair of the government panel negotiating peace with communist rebels, is now also negotiating for the lifting of a hold-departure order on suspected "jueteng" lord Jesus "Jessie" Vico.

Bello yesterday visited Senate President Aquilino Pimentel Jr. at the Senate in a bid to get Vico, a former mayor of San Rafael, Bulacan, out of the hold-departure order list.

The Senate blue ribbon panel under Pimentel had ordered the travel ban on Vico, who was linked to the jueteng operations that reportedly involved ousted President Joseph Estrada.

Ilocos Sur Gov. Luis "Chavit" Singson said Vico delivered jueteng money to former San Juan Mayor Jinggoy Estrada.

"Secretary Bello was here not in connection with any negotiations with the communist rebels. He came over to inquire if the blue ribbon committee could lift or modify its order banning the travel of Mayor Vico of Bulacan," Pimentel told reporters.

Pimentel said he told Bello that they may grant the request.

He asked Bello to have Vico come up with a motion for reconsideration on the travel ban. He also said it was also important for Vico to ensure that he will "make himself available to the committee whenever needed."

He said that was the only reason why the Senate panel had asked the Bureau of Immigration to apply the travel ban on Vico.

He said Bello must have been acting as one of Vico's lawyers. "It looks like he is one of the lawyers of Vico," he said.

The BI issued the travel ban on Vico on Oct. 17, 2000 at the height of the Senate investigations on the jueteng operations.

LIBYA FOLLOW-UP Talks to resume in KL

DIGOS CITY—Peace talks between the government and the Moro Islamic Liberation Front are to resume in the Malaysian capital of Kuala Lumpur next week, MILF spokesman Eid Kabalu said.

The second round of negotiations will begin on July 24 "and could last for one or two days, depending on the developments," Kabalu said.

Negotiators from both sides would work out specific details of a landmark truce signed in Libya last month, Kabalu said.

They would also try to hammer out guidelines for the selection of members of an Organization of Islamic Conference (OIC) "monitoring team" provided under last month's agreement, he added.

Kabalu said that like the first round in Tripoli last month, the Kuala Lumpur negotiations would continue to be "open-ended."

"We do not know how long these negotiations could go on, but we are determined to find a peaceful solution to the Bangsamoro problem," Kabalu said.

Independence issue

Kabalu declined to confirm reports that independence would be among the issues the MILF would present to the government panel, chaired by Undersecretary Jesus Dureza, the presidential assistant for regional concerns-Southern Mindanao.

Earlier, Dureza said the MILF could always bring up the issue but the government's response would be, as always, to abide by the Constitution and the guidelines set down for the talks.

Kabalu said independence remains at the top of the MILF agenda but the peace talks were not tied to it.

"The MILF, being the voice of the Bangsamoro, only acts as the messenger of sentiments. If the Bangsamoro people would choose other forms of government aside from independence, then we would oblige," Kabalu said.

He said the MILF has no qualms about agreeing to autonomy, which was accepted by the Nur Misuari-led Moro National Liberation Front, "as long as it is real and reflects the sentiments of the people."

Ceasefire

On June 22, the government and the MILF signed a ceasefire deal in the Libyan capital of Tripoli.

The deal would allow the introduction of economic development in Mindanao and rehabilitation of areas devastated by a massive military assault against the MILF last year.

Troops would also be pulled out from the MILF's main camp, overrun by the military, while several "working committees" are to be established to oversee implementation of the accord.

Kabalu said a protracted hostage crisis involving the Abu Sayyaf would not be on the agenda of the talks, although the MILF has expressed concern over the military's massive arrests of alleged rebels and sympathizers in recent days.

The Abu Sayyaf is holding 21 US and Filipino hostages on Basilan island.

The Armed Forces have accused MILF members of aiding Abu Sayyaf rebels trying to escape a massive military operation.

President Macapagal-Arroyo has given troops powers to arrest suspected Abu Sayyaf members and supporters in a bid to end the hostage crisis.

More than 50 people have been detained since Friday, of whom 34 have been charged, with the rest freed on lack of evidence, officials said.

Desecration

Kabalu said the MILF had received reports of soldiers desecrating mosques and randomly picking up male civilians in Muslim-populated villages.

"This is very, very alarming. We are closely monitoring and documenting the situation just in case we may be compelled to present them to the government peace panel," Kabalu said. "But that's not yet on the agenda, and we are having these reports verified."

Meanwhile, three persons were killed on Monday when MILF rebels clashed with government soldiers in Shariff Aguak, Maguindanao province.

The skirmishes forced the military securing portions of the Cotabato-General Santos highway to close the road for about 10 hours.

"We have to close the highway to prevent injuries to commuters," Maj. Julieta Ando, 6th Infantry Division spokesperson, said.

Ando said soldiers clashed with the rebels in Shariff Aguak. Allan A. Naval, Edwin O. Fernandez and Charlie C. Señase, PDI Mindanao Bureau, and AFP

Gloria to visit Malaysia for 1st foreign trip

PRESIDENT Macapagal-Arroyo will make her first foreign trip with a visit to neighboring Malaysia next month to discuss economic and security cooperation, officials said yesterday.

Ms Macapagal is also scheduled to visit five other Asian countries, including China and Japan, this year, officials said.

The President will meet with Malaysian Prime Minister Mahathir Mohamad, King Sultan Salahuddin Abdul Aziz Shah and other top officials in Kuala Lumpur during her Aug. 7-9 visit, Philippine and Malaysian officials said.

Foreign Undersecretary Lauro Baja said her discussions will focus on economic cooperation and ways to expand investment.

She is also expected to tackle security issues and convey her thanks for Malaysia's support for peace talks between the Philippine government and the Muslim separatist group, the Moro Islamic Liberation Front, Baja said.

The talks are to resume in Kuala Lumpur next week after an initial round of negotiations in Libya last month.

An area of concern between the two Asian nations is security along their common border, which is prone to intrusions by smugglers, pirates, illegal fishermen and Muslim guerrillas.

Last year, members of the Philippine Muslim extremist group, the Abu Sayyaf, crossed into Malaysia and abducted scores of foreigners and workers in a dive resort and took their captives back to Jolo island. Both countries have intensified joint patrols since then.

Ms Macapagal will also visit Brunei and Singapore from Aug. 22 to 26, then visit Japan for three days starting Sept. 12, Baja said. She will attend the annual summit of the 21-member Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation forum in October in Shanghai.

Baja said a trip by Ms Macapagal to Thailand has been scheduled in November but no date has been fixed. In January, Arroyo will be in Davos, Switzerland, for an economic conference, then she plans to proceed to Britain, he said.

She was swept to power in January when her predecessor, Joseph Estrada was toppled amid street protests over allegations of massive corruption.

She has spent most of her time dealing with a series of crisis, including a failed attempt to oust her and the kidnapping of dozens of people, including three Americans, by the Abu Sayyaf in Basilan. AP

BENIPAYO

Long, slow count enters 3rd month

BY GERALD G. LACUARTA

TWO months and still counting.

The Commission on Elections' canvassing for the senatorial and party-list elections entered its third month yesterday with no clear indication yet on when the poll body will be able to complete the count.

The Comelec started canvassing the certificates of canvass for the senatorial and party-list votes at the Philippine International Convention Center on May 17, three days after the elections. Two months later, the Comelec is still counting. "This is the longest election count ever," noted former immigration commissioner Rufus Rodriguez, lawyer for Sen. Loi Ejercito who filed four petitions questioning 180,000 votes for Sen. Ralph Recto.

"It's been more than two months after the senatorial canvass began on May 17 yet the Comelec has not even determined who are the 12th and 13th placers in the Senate race," Rodriguez said. "This is becoming the slowest count in history."

Asked in a recent news conference when the Comelec planned to wrap up the canvassing, Comelec Chair Alfredo Benipayo said the en banc had agreed to reconvene the National Board of Canvassers to resolve Rodriguez's petitions and at the same time correct discrepancies in the party-list canvass.

Benipayo, in an order issued last week, set a hearing on Rodriguez's four petitions today, or only four days before the opening of Congress.

In limbo

The petitions were filed by Rodriguez between June 2 and June 19 but had gathered dust at the NBOC due to the delayed canvassing for Lanao del Sur and feuds among Comelec commissioners.

Thus, more than two months since the senatorial canvass began, the Comelec has yet to determine the final tally for the 13 winning senators in the May 14 elections.

In limbo is the final ranking of Recto and Sen. Gregorio Honasan, who are locked in a tight battle for the 12th position which carries with it a full six-year term. The eventual 13th placer would serve only for three years to complete the unfinished term of former Sen. Teofisto Guingona, now Vice President.

Recto and Honasan were in 12th and 13th places, respectively, when the 13 senators were proclaimed on June 4 but Rodriguez, in his third petition on June 19, revealed that Recto's tally as of June 4, which was 10,387,108, still included 30,000 padded votes, which the NBOC had ordered deducted in an earlier resolution.

Rodriguez asked the NBOC to deduct the 30,000 votes in Zamboanga del Norte from Recto and issue resolution stating that Honasan was 12th with 10,364,272 votes as of June 4, while Recto was 13th with 10,357,108.

The PnM also questioned a total of 150,000 votes which were allegedly padded in favor of Recto in 20 towns in Lanao del Norte, Maguindanao and Lanao del Sur.

Benipayo ordered Recto to file his comment within three "inextendible" days from receipt of the order except in the case of the third petition where Recto's lawyers have already filed an answer.

The NBOC had earlier granted Rodriguez's petitions questioning manifest errors in several provincial certificates of canvass which favored Recto.

Vote padding

The NBOC, in Resolution 01-003, ordered the deduction of a total of 79,000 votes from Recto's total in the provinces of Tawi-Tawi and Zamboanga del Norte. Recto also lost 15,000 votes in Palimbang, Sultan Kudarat, after the NBC ruled that the town's COC be excluded because of massive padding of votes.

Benipayo said the NBOC will also hear petitions filed by several party-list groups for the correction of votes in the party-list canvass, particularly the one filed by Anak Mindanao (Amin) whose 83,090 votes in Tawi-Tawi went missing in the total votes for the Autonomous Region in Muslim Mindanao.

Mujiv Hataman, Amin nominee, said if the 83,090 Amin votes in Tawi-Tawi were added to their total, they would have surpassed the two-percent minimum vote requirement to get a seat in the House of Representatives.

Hataman also asked the Comelec to look into a discrepancy in the Comelec canvass report which showed that there are 3.5 million more party-list votes than there were actual voters who voted in the party-list elections on May 14.

Racism 'very real' in Australia, says immigrant

BY VINCENT CABREZA
PDI Northern Luzon Bureau

BAGUIO CITY—Racism is a "very real" condition in Australia although it was magnified only recently by the massacre of Teddy Gonzales, his wife and their daughter.

Artist Santiago Bose aired this opinion in talking about the massacre of the Gonzalezes, who belonged to old Baguio families and who migrated to Australia after a killer earthquake hit the mountain city in 1990.

Bose, a native of Baguio and now a resident of Melbourne where he is raising a 5-year-old child, said that prejudice against Asian immigrants in Australia had been swelling since 1984, and that it was the shift to a conservative government that had made racism there "more pronounced."

"The fact that Teddy was an immigration lawyer in a rich neighborhood made him a target," Bose told the INQUIRER.

"But life in Australia is different. Gun control is stricter, so there are few loose firearms. The neighborhoods are insured against theft so you rarely lock your doors. The massacre is a big story because a massacre is so much a personal crime. That makes racists there the usual suspects," he said.

Bose said news in Australia about the murders had been sparse and pieces of information offered by authorities were often filtered through the conservative media or the more liberal but less circulated newspapers from Sydney and Canberra, the government center.

"Maybe that's why the newspapers immediately discounted the racial overtones. They did not want to spark the racism that was an issue in Australia in 1984," Bose said.

'Asianization'

In a June 1988 edition of Newsweek magazine, Australia was described as a frontier that was "fretting and arguing (about) its Asianization."

"Until 1973, Australia might as well have posted signs along the coastline: No Asians Need Apply," Newsweek said, adding:

"That year, the leaders in Canberra belatedly confronted the fact that their Asian neighbors were amassing formidable economic power... The rapid growth in the number of (Australia's) Asian immigrants (as a result of that economic growth) has given rise to white racism. Graffiti screaming 'Asians Out!' are a not uncommon sight in urban areas."

Bose said the Gonzalezes' case was one of the few violent attacks so far on Asians.

"Intolerance is very pronounced there because a traditional 'White Australia' culture still prevails," he said.

Another Baguio resident, who declined to be identified, said she was often rebuffed by Australians even during walks in the park.

"I would smile but I never got a smile in return. Maybe it is their culture, but I saw (the movie) 'Crocodile Dundee,' and (actor Paul Hogan) smiled a lot. I thought that was their way, too. I was wrong. I never felt welcome," said the resident, who flew home from Sydney last month.

Political climate

Bose said it was the political climate and not individual sentiment, that was provoking much of the racial division.

He said Australia had been in the center of a political debate this year, after a "White Australia" proponent began earning support from Australian conservatives.

"The conservatives who want more regulations on Asians come from the provinces. The Labor Party has more influence in the cities like Sydney and Melbourne," Bose said.

He added: "Most of our Filipinos are in the cities, where they have good jobs. But there are also Filipinos in Blacktown, an urban area where low cost housing is common. Filipinos feel that a change in government will suit them better."

Baguio hosts a number of Australian expatriates who own thriving businesses.

"Most of these expatriates feel a little awkward about the murders and they do not want to aggravate it," said Elmer Lopez, a security consultant hired by a prominent Australian resident in the city.

Veep wants ...

awaiting their go-signal, sources at the Department of Foreign Affairs said. Lawyer Antonio Curameng, head of the DFA's Consular Assistance Division, confirmed this.

Immigration lawyer Teddy Gonzales, his wife Mary Josephine Lowiva and their teenage daughter Clodine will be buried on Friday in Sydney, to where they migrated in the early 1990s.

A week after the Gonzalezes' 20-year-old son Sef discovered the bodies in the family home in North Ryde, an upper middle class suburb in Sydney, the Task Force Tawas, a team of 20 special detectives, has yet to crack the case.

In an interview, Philippine Consul General Libran Cabactulan told the INQUIRER that Sef Gonzales and his next of kin had decided to bury his parents and sister in Sydney.

According to Cabactulan, there will be "no public viewing" of the bodies.

The consul general noted that detectives had yet to issue an official report on the motive and identity of the perpetrators after almost a week of evidence gathering and interviews with the victims' neighbors and friends.

"Normally, (the investigation) takes a little while. But in this case, the length of the investigation depends on the evidence gathered," he said.

Cabactulan said detectives were not zeroing in on one angle but were considering a wide range of angles, such as whether the murders were done by any of Gonzales' clients.

He also said Australian authorities were upset with local papers' reports quoting police as saying that Sef was probably home when his parents and sister were murdered on July 10.

The Australian had reported that police believe all four family members were together in their home between 5 and 8 p.m. on that day.

But the Canberra Times had said police believe that Sef joined his friends in the city around 8 p.m. and arrived home around midnight to find his parents and sister dead.

Copies of the reports, dated July 13, were faxed by the Philippine Embassy in Canberra to Manila on Monday.

"The police here said they were satisfied with Sef's willingness to cooperate with them in their investigation," Cabactulan said.

Police had theorized that mother and daughter were already dead when Teddy Gonzales came home around 7 p.m. after an hour-long drive from Blacktown, and that he too was killed after he disturbed the killers.

Lowiva, who worked at her husband's law office, knocked off from work around 5 p.m. July 10. Clodine was believed home all day that day.

On busy Kildare Road in Blacktown, passersby gawk at the second floor office in the modern red brick building across the street from the cinema.

Most everyone stops to read the name of the now dead occupant, whose name is spelled out in bold letters on the clear glass windows.

"That's the office of the murdered man in the news," said a middle-aged woman. "It's pretty eerie, isn't it?"

Early on July 11, Filipino accountant Oscar Clemente, who holds office next door to Teddy's office, received a call saying that the Gonzalezes were not coming to work "because they had an accident."

Clemente said he advised three or four of Teddy's clients waiting outside the lawyer's office to leave their messages and go home.

Later, Clemente was told of the "real accident," and he was stunned.

"I couldn't believe it... I was horrified," he said. "I saw him and Mary here every day. Ted and I often bumped into each other on the way to the toilet."

Another Filipino lawyer, Bernie David, who occupies another office on the same floor, said he saw Teddy the day before the murders.

"He seemed okay. He was talking about how our work often gets stressful, but he was okay," David said.

He also said the Gonzalezes were "very loving and always holding hands."

The family lived for a while in Blacktown, where Teddy started his law practice in a small office at home.

When his practice grew, he moved his office to the building on Kildare Road.

The family moved to North Ryde before Christmas last year.

Consul General Cabactulan said New South Wales police superintendent Ron Smith had given the Philippine government "full access to the case, but we could see that (the police) are facing a blank wall."

He said the police had admitted that the case had "a wider angle," which detectives were now looking into.

Earlier reports on the racial slur supposedly written in blood on a wall of the Gonzales home had no confirmation from the police, Cabactulan said.

"It is an issue but it is not a big deal especially here in Sydney," he said. "When you speak of racism, it could be true, but to translate it to murderous violence, I do not believe it is true. There has got to be a more solid explanation."

Community leader Lolita Farmer said she did not believe it was a racially motivated crime because there were "no facts to base it on."

Farmer, a practicing lawyer in Sydney, member of the NSW Law Society and president of the Philippine Community Council in NSW, said she also did not believe that the murders were an attack on the Filipino community.

"We are the envy of many ethnic communities because we are law-abiding citizens of this country," she said.

Farmer expressed more concern about the rising violence in Sydney than on racial discrimination.

"This is the issue because crime is on the rise," she said. "We don't feel safe anymore even inside our homes."

Collateral damage

GOVERNMENT troops have rounded up dozens of suspected members and supporters of the Abu Sayyaf at the start of a campaign to crush what government spokespersons have described as "lawless violence" in the provinces of Basilan, Sulu and Tawi-Tawi as well as Zamboanga City. President Gloria Macapagal-Arroyo said these new operations are intended to flush out Abu Sayyaf bandits, confiscate their equipment and isolate their active supporters, including those who supply them with weapons, ammunition, food, information and sanctuary. "It's like cleaning the town of the contamination of the Abu Sayyaf," said Basilan Gov. Wahab Akbar. Brig. Gen. Edilberto Adan, the military spokesperson, has an even more colorful metaphor for the operation: "We are draining the pond that supports the terrorist fish."

The problem is that, as any fishpond operator knows, draining the pond kills all kinds of fish, both edible and poisonous. Which is what seems to be happening there. By Tuesday, the government had to release 31 persons arrested during the raids after prosecutors found no evidence against them. A total of 41 suspects were to be charged with kidnapping for ransom or conspiracy to commit the crime. Adan said one those who were arrested in Basilan has been tagged as a leader of middle rank in the Abu Sayyaf organization with a P1-million reward on his head. Maj. Alberto Gepilano, civil-military operations officer of Task Force Comet, said four persons in military custody have been positively identified as Abu Sayyaf members. It seems that in the government's pond-draining operation, no big terrorist fish has been found stranded on dry land.

All this is hardly an acceptable batting average. The military is supposed to be working with a list of 200 bandits and their sympathizers, so why were so many innocent citizens inconvenienced and humiliated by being hauled off in trucks, with their hands tied behind their backs and detained in military camps? When one considers the embarrassment, the fear and the anxiety such arrests caused both to innocent civilians and their families, one must wonder about the justness of the campaign. And when one considers the resentment such injustice engenders, one must wonder about its wisdom.

Without doubt, the government has to wipe out the base of support of the Abu Sayyaf. Certainly it should put behind bars not only its members but also those who provide them arms, food and information. But this cannot be done by arresting anyone identified as a bandit or a sympathizer by hooded "spotters." With the government offering millions as reward for the arrest of key Abu Sayyaf personalities, the temptation is strong to point at anyone and everyone as a bandit leader. Besides there will be "informers" who will implicate others out of revenge or simple mischief.

There is still no substitute for good intelligence work. That's what enabled the military and the police to capture Nadzmie Saabdulla, alias Commander Global, the chief of staff of the Sulu faction of the Abu Sayyaf, and one of its intelligence agents.

What the government is doing is the judicial equivalent of carpet bombing when what is needed is a surgical strike. With the collateral damage mounting, the government ought to change its tactics before it loses the war for good. Injustice is always a rich breeding ground for rebellion.

Crimes against humanity

THE TRANSFER of former Yugoslav President Slobodan Milosevic to the UN tribunal in The Hague has given hope to survivors of a decade of Balkan wars that they may yet see answers to questions about some of the worst atrocities committed in Europe since World War II.

Alfredo Astiz, the so-called "blond angel of death" one of the most infamous death squad leaders during Argentina's dictatorship of the 1970s has been arrested in Buenos Aires at the request of an Italian judge, and a court in Belgium agreed to take a case against Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, who is being pursued by survivors of the 1982 Sabra and Shatilla massacres.

What the Pinochet, Sharon and Astiz cases have in common is that the significant, but painfully slow progress that has been made in the cause of truth and justice is the result only of painstaking campaigns by individual victims, principled judges and human rights campaigners. If matters were left up to world governments, none of these cases would have been brought forward.

The Jordan Times (Amman, Jordan)

OilEx an antidote to the local oil cartel

AS I SEE IT

refined from the lower priced crude. The price of crude in the world market has fallen, but the local Big 3 announced that it does not contemplate lowering its prices. And the government is not doing anything about it.

The government must know that the cartel is overpricing but its officials are either in cahoots with the Big 3 or it does not know what to do. It has tied its own hands with the Oil Deregulation Law. Deregulation was intended to encourage competition which is supposed to push prices down. But instead of competing, the new oil companies, which have only a 10 percent share of the market, have joined the Big 3 pricing because it is more profitable for them. Talk of opportunism.

During the last Congress, one representative tried to fight the oil cartel by filing a bill that would create a National Oil Exchange (OilEx for short) that would make deregulation and competition a reality. It would bid out to more than 40 oil refineries and traders in the world the petroleum needs of the Philippines. The lowest bidder gets the right to supply us. Thus, Filipinos would be assured of the lowest price possible in the world. But Rep. Enrique Garcia of Bataan, was like a lonely Don Quixote tilting at windmills. Few helped him fight the oil cartel.

President Gloria Macapagal-Arroyo promised to certify his OilEx bill as urgent to Congress provided he removed all its defects. That Garcia has done. He has filed a new bill in the House of Representatives (Senate President Aquilino Pimentel Jr. has promised to push it in the Senate and Sen. Edgardo Angara, leader of the Senate opposition, has promised to support it) that is better and simpler than the original. In the original, the OilEx would buy the petroleum from the winning bidders, store them in storage tanks in Subic and sell them to the Big 3 and other distributors.

In the revised version, the OilEx would simply conduct the bidding. The volume that the OilEx will bid will be based mainly on our total requirements of refined petroleum products (RPPs), such as gasoline, diesel, lubricating oils, kerosene, aviation fuel, liquefied petroleum gas (LPG), etc. After the bidding, the OilEx will award the volumes to the qualified winning bidders. The local marketing oil companies will then directly make arrangements with the winning refineries or traders for the payment and delivery of the volumes they submitted to the OilEx.

In the revised bill, the OilEx will be involved, in a very limited way, only in the refining/importing sector. It will not at all affect any aspect of the local marketing sector. Its only function is to bid (spot market) and/or negotiate (term contracts) our country's total requirements of RPPs to all oil refineries and traders in the world.

The cost of running the OilEx will be added to the cost of the RPPs. Even assuming that the cost of operation will reach P100 million a year (which is not likely), the amount would still be negligible, considering that it would add only one-half centavo (P0.005) to the price of a liter of gasoline.

that took a long time to bury. At least I figure there must be someone inside the coffin that was displayed prominently through an open door, light bulbs burning fiercely day and night. This was at the height of "Edsa III." At first I commiserated in my heart with the family of the bereaved, knowing how hard it is to lose a loved one. I lost my father when I was very young and the smell of tears and flowers always come back whenever I see a wake. But not after the way the people who attended the wake showed their grief. They promptly set up tables where they played pusoy and mahjong, and were soon overrunning the street.

During the first days, or nights, of the wake, those tables were just confined to the sidewalk, which was already an inconvenience as it was a busy street where people going to and from their office walked past. Soon, however, the tables spilled out into the street, occupying half of it, which completely snarled traffic. The street, already clogged because SM North Edsa disgorged its customers into it, became bedlam on weekends, it also being home to a church, which held masses during Saturdays and Sundays. The gamblers soon pitched a tent over the gaming tables on the street, and hung incandescent lamps overhead to light up the place at night, when the gambling was at its fiercest. The tolda and the people moving in and out of them made the street virtually impassable from late afternoon when the playing began. To make matters worse, some of the organizers of what had obviously become an open-air gambling joint, nailed a board of wood on the street to serve as a hump, to slow down vehicles—which had already dropped to a crawl—and ensure the safety of the patrons on the street.

Either the dead was such a popular figure that he drew in a throng from far and wide, or he was making a lot of money for some people who were enterprising enough to embrace him as their own. Or, well, maybe he was a relative too, but his loved ones were loath to see him go without profiting from his departure. The occupation of the street and the frenzied gambling, which began from late afternoon and lasted till dawn, took place in plain view of the barangay officials and the cops who patrolled the area. I do not know that their sudden discovery of tolerance and liberalism owed to their newfound capacity to share the grief of the bereaved. Quite apart from the way the improvised gambling joint was messing up traffic, it was also giving rise to anxieties from residents that the crime rate in the area might shoot up. The characters that were congregating around the gambling tables were not altogether savory, nor did they wear a funeral look.

The wake lasted two weeks, such was the reluctance of the dead's love ones to see him go. It coincided with the aftermath of the May 1st riots in Mendiola. A couple of days after those riots, when people were free to devote their attention to new afflictions once again, the aforementioned dead was put to rest. The tolda in our street folded up, though I cannot say for sure never to be put up again. People have a way of dying plentifully these days and being mourned in this fashion doggedly. Even in our street.

Someone I know who has betted heavily in such a wake—a legitimate one, he hastens to add, the dead being the kin of a friend—has a cynical justification for the practice. At least, he says, the dead will have served a useful purpose in death, if not in life. I don't know. I've always thought myself that dying is not a reasonable excuse to inconvenience the living. Certainly, it is not a reasonable excuse for the living to use the dead to inconvenience the living. A great deal in us has died, or is dying, and I don't know how we can bring it back to life again.

You look at the characters in wakes like this, and you would be at pains to distinguish the living from the dead.

Bruising policy clashes seen at G-7 summit

SINCE the advent of the George W. Bush administration in Washington, the United States has strode on the world stage flaunting its power, and antagonizing its European allies over a range of issues, and exacerbating tensions between the United States and China over missile defense policies.

As the Group of Seven industrial democracies, plus Russia, prepares to meet at its summit in the port city of Genoa at the weekend, the foremost threat to the G-7's unity comes from expected policy clashes between the United States and its allies over such issues as climatic change and alternative sources of energy to fossil fuels.

As if the collision threat is not enough, the Genoa summit will come under siege from thousands of anti-globalist activists who plan to protest against the world economic order without presenting an alternative program, except disrupting the summit with violence.

The violence in the siege of Seattle, Davos, Melbourne or Prague illustrates the disruptive capacity of the well-financed globalized NGOs which are run by jet-setters like the official delegations they rail against at the summit. It also demonstrates the closure of dialogue between the two antagonistic points of view about distribution of global resources and wealth. The alternative summits have also become a global industry, interlinked by the high-tech tools of the corporate world and governments. The Italian government has planned to use a ship, anchored off the harbor, as a venue for the summit.

If the channels of peaceful dialogue between the establishment delegations and the activists have been already closed, the stage for a collision between US triumphalism and its capitalist allies will even be more earth-shaking than the siege of the global activists whose agendas are as varied and contradictory as the NGOs.

Bush will come to the summit determined to show to the Europeans, the Japanese and the Russians who is boss in imposing the rules of economic, environmental and defense global order. But it is a comfort to know that some European monetary experts are predicting that the current US economic slowdown foreshadows the weakening of the dollar relative to the euro, the much-bellied European economic community's currency.

ANALYSIS

Amando Doronila

A bruising policy clash looms at Genoa over the Bush administration's opposition to European-backed proposals to phase out fossil fuel subsidies and increase financing for non-polluting energy sources.

In a report by The New York Times, which had access to the final draft of a G-7 task force, the draft called on rich nations to "remove incentives and other support for environmentally harmful energy technologies." The draft also encouraged them "to shift priorities of international lending agencies, like the World Bank, to support more clean energy projects in poor nations."

The proposals are contained in a report commissioned by the G-7. According to the Times, the proposals sought "to commit rich nations to help a billion people around the world get their power from renewable energy sources, like wind, water and the sun."

The Times reported that the White House said its opposition to the proposals was "based on a desire to let the marketplace, rather than government, decide how quickly renewable energy sources are adopted worldwide."

But administration critics have pointed out that the "marketplace" is a mantra to justify yet another example of the Bush administration's "placing the interest of oil and gas companies ahead of the drive to reduce global warming."

US opposition, the Times reported, could effectively prevent the G-7 from endorsing the proposals during the summit which works by consensus, without which proposals can be stifled. "People who helped prepare the report said that one important objective was to persuade wealthy nations to stop promoting fossil-fuel projects in the developing world, a step that could reduce sales of power plants, drilling equipment and other goods used in producing energy from oil and coal," the Times reported.

While the Bush administration supports the idea of expanding use of renewable energy sources, the report said, it does not favor the task force's emphasis on government-to-government funding, an administration official is reported as saying. The official said the goal of a billion people relying on clean energy sources within a decade was a target that had "no analytical basis."

Critics said the rejection of the report was the "latest example of the Bush administration's undermining of international efforts to combat emissions of greenhouse gases." This followed the announcement by President Bush last spring that the United States had no intention of meeting the targets of the Kyoto treaty. The Kyoto Protocol sets targets for cuts in carbon emissions.

The US resistance to the G-7 proposals that seek to reduce dependence on fossil fuel-based projects throws a cloud over plans to use the Genoa summit to promote talks on global warming through the Kyoto Protocol.

Daphne Wysham of the Institute for Policy Studies in Washington said that, "By rejecting the task force's recommendations, President Bush is once again undermining any attempt to take serious action on global warming." A study by the institute and Friends of the Earth, an environmental organization, has found that export-promotion agencies of the rich nations, like the Export-Import Bank of the United States, are the world's largest public backers of fossil fuels.

The scale of the policy clash between Washington and the Europeans over environmental issues is illustrated by a United Nations conference at the weekend in Bonn, Germany, on the fate of the Kyoto Protocol. The Europeans are incensed over Bush's decision last March, proclaiming the treaty as dead. Bush has said the protocol does not deserve to survive. He said the treaty, which requires industrialized countries to cut greenhouse emissions by about 5 percent between 1990 and 2010 was "fatally flawed."

A meeting in Tokyo last week to persuade the United States to lessen its objections to the treaty hit an impasse. The United States rejected it on the basis that it was "unfair and too costly."

Food scares and scams

WHILE assuring the public that it has nothing to fear, at least not right away, from imported soy sauce, Health Secretary Manuel Dayrit let go a mouthful.

Responding to a question about the allegedly cancer-causing ingredient 3-MCPD contained in 22 brands of soy sauce and other condiments, most of them from China, Dayrit said test results were inconclusive as these had been conducted only on laboratory rats so far. "We are far more sure about cigarettes. Studies have already shown a clear link between cigarette smoking and cancer," he said.

Indeed, the things we choose to scare ourselves about! Here we are raising a new cancer bogey in the form of soy sauce, when all the while we have allowed a far more lethal and scientifically validated cancer-causing agent to be freely manufactured, distributed and even heavily advertised. Advertised? Hell, even glorified, as witness scenes on TV, movies and MTV. (Where would dark, back-lit scenes get their drama if not from swirls of cigarette smoke?)

Dayrit should also get a medal of valor from health advocates for in mentioning cigarettes alongside the supposedly cancerous soy sauce, he slammed a double whammy on another Cabinet member: Trade Secretary Mar Roxas.

It was Roxas, after all, who first raised alarms over the imported soy sauce and condiments, which have been reportedly banned in the United Kingdom, Malaysia, New Zealand and Australia. It was also Roxas who convinced President Gloria Macapagal-Arroyo to cut the ribbon at the inauguration of the new Phillip Morris plant, a billion-peso cigarette manufacturing facility. The President's presence at the event, if you recall, drew protests from the health secretary who had been leading a so far frustrating drive against smoking.

When you're trying to convince a skeptical public that it's in its best interest not to smoke, how are you supposed to feel when your President graces the opening of a major new cigarette plant?

ACTUALLY, I can't blame the President or even Roxas for that matter. Given the dire economic scenario, it would have been foolhardy to ignore the establishment of a plant that would not only provide hundreds of jobs, pay taxes and benefit tobacco farmers, but also send rosy signals to future investors.

Faith in the country's prospects deserves some reward.

But if we go by the calculations of both public and private health experts, even with the new manufacturing facility, any income derived from the tobacco industry is more than offset by the cost to the health system of diseases and ailments caused by smoking.

To put it another way, the government and the entire health sector spend far more to treat the consequences of smoking than it earns from cigarette taxes. Add to these calculations the cost in terms of people-hours lost due to absenteeism and chronic illness, to asthma attacks due to first- or second-hand smoke, or even to fires caused by untended lit cigarettes, and the equation gets even more skewed.

Who's making more economic sense, the trade secretary or the health secretary?

CIGARETTES aside, it also strikes me as funny how we get scared out of our wits and appetites by alarms raised abroad, but choose to ignore even more real scares right under our noses.

We swear off beef after the Mad Cow controversy, and now have struck off our grocery lists made-in-China soy sauce, oyster sauce and other condiments. But what about taho?

Unscrupulous makers of taho, or soya jelly, it has been reported, have been known to use plaster of Paris to hasten the jelling process. Does the plaster of Paris make its way out of our system, or does it settle in our intestinal crevices? And have you ever wondered under what sanitary conditions bagoong or patis is made? And did you know that among the ingredients used in commercial vinegar is hydrochloric acid?

I never did get to ride on the pearl shakes bandwagon, and not just because they're spiked with sugar. My aversion can really be traced to an episode of "Imbestigador," which happened to deal with the complaints of workers in a sago sweatshop, but in the process showed exactly how these humongous "pearls" of sago are made.

Watching the men, who were made to sleep on the cement floor of the bodega or atop sacks of raw sago, presumably without benefit of a morning shower, "mix" the ingredients by churning them with their feet inside huge vats, I felt my insides squirm and squish. Ugh! I can't look at anyone slurping those pearls through those huge "PVC" straws these days without recalling the sight.

SPEAKING of queasy food, there seems to be an Internet scam circulating that purports to show Taiwanese enjoying the latest "gourmet" treat: human fetuses.

The images come prefaced by sincere-sounding appeals to stop this "inhuman" practice, although no one seems to be doing anything about it beyond scaring everybody else with the unsavory images. Downloaded, the images come in chronological sequence, showing smiling customers "buying" fetus packets, having them cooked, then served in what looks like a sleazy diner. The "fetuses" look like a singularly unappetizing slab of burnt meat. I don't know why anyone would pay good money for it, even if it were really a human fetus.

Would anyone engaged in this form of cannibalism go to all the trouble of posing for a photographer? For what reason? To advertise it?

The images "felt" familiar, and I recalled a similar Internet scam this time about female customers (allegedly of a popular pizza place) being videotaped while they used the ladies' room. The pictures felt much too posed to be credible, and the women "customers" looked Chinese, too. I suspect there's a group of pranksters, probably based in Taiwan, who specialize in staging and creating outrageous images meant to shock and create controversy. I've received the images twice now, and please, twice is two times too often. Enough already.

Treasures in Mehan grounds

NOW that it is established that the present Mehan Gardens is but a part of the former Jardin Botánico, the protected historical and archaeological site covers more than the contested plots of land where Mayor Lito Atienza insists on building the City College of Manila and the Park and Ride Terminal. The area is bigger than we thought bounded by the post office, the walls of Intramuros, Arroceros all the way down to Concepcion Street, literally at the foot of the Manila City Hall. I admit the place is not as clean and green as it should be, but it is rich in historical and archaeological significance.

If you are passing by the Metropolitan Theater en route to Quiapo these days, look into the fenced-off area where the Park and Ride Terminal was slowly developing before it was stopped by this controversy. There is a metal structure already standing there which makes me wonder how the contractors managed to secure a Department of Environment and Natural Resources permit to even dig here without the required clearance from the National Historical Institute and the National Museum. I presume a DENR permit was issued before excavation began, so who issued the DENR permit? Why didn't this official check with the NHI and the National Museum? Someone should look into this to prevent further cultural damage not only in the Jardin Botánico but in other historical and archaeological sites around the country, overlooked because our attention is focused on the Jardin Botánico.

History tells us that the Spaniards were threatened by the huge Chinese population and segregated them in ghettos. A part of Binondo was designated as a settlement for Chinese converts to Christianity while their "heathen" brothers were restricted to the Parian where the Metropolitan Theater and Post Office stand today. The late H. Otley Beyer explored the areas south of the Pasig before the war, identifying rich archaeological sites at the south approach of the Quezon Bridge, Post Office and Metropol-tan Theater. In his "Outline Review of Philippine Archeology by Islands and Provinces (1947)," those excavated deeply before the war "produced enormous collections of interesting ceramic and other materials from the old Chinese Parian of the late 16th and early 17th centuries. Little modern material, except in upper soil layers."

Half a century later, the National Museum with modern equipment and better-trained archaeologists can reexcavate the Jardin Botánico area to unearth pre-Spanish cultural materials. This is a possibility as Beyer was able to find, in other areas of downtown Manila, fossilized remains of the Elephas maximus (Indicus) that makes you ponder how, when and why these great Indian elephants got to Manila in the first place.

From April to December 1952, Beyer was busy excavating in the basement of the Bureau of Science building in Manila where he had stored one-third of his archaeological collection at the beginning of the war. They could not recover the specimens there after the Battle for Manila in 1945 because the building was burned and later flooded with two to three feet of water. They waited three years for the water to drain and another two years for the place to become dry enough for work. As Beyer described the place:

"In brief, we discovered that the Japanese soldiers had dumped hundreds of our specimen boxes and trays into a long window, along one entire side of the [West wing] basement, and then covered them with tons of dirt and sand—to form a barricade behind which they fought the attacking Americans. In places, this huge pile had been further disturbed and mixed up by bomb dispersal squads, after the fighting was over.

"We had to excavate nearly the whole pile, and it took us over eight months and cost me about 3,000 pesos for labor, containers, transportation etc. In return, we recovered over 400 boxes full of ceramic fragments, stone implements and other specimens that were not too badly damaged. There were also several hundreds of beads, bracelet fragments and other jewelry—but most of them had been melted or discolored by the fire, although some were still in fairly good condition. The importance of the collection is that it came from our Novaliches sites A, C and H—and contained about 75 percent of the bulk specimens from our Philippine early Iron Age collection...although all labels were of course destroyed, I have a very clear remembrance of the origin of the material—and I have been able to resort nearly 80 percent of it by sites."

"From one section of the pile we also recovered a large quantity (more than 60 boxes totaling over a hundred cubic feet) of the fine Middle Ming porcelain fragments originally excavated from the Post Office and Metropolitan Theater sites; and in another section we found some of the Sung porcelain fragments from the lake district. The pottery and porcelain fragments were, in general, in quite good condition—only a few of them being blistered by the fire or stained with iron rust. So our Bureau of Science excavation was really worthwhile!"

Again, mention of archaeological finds in the Jardin Botánico but the next question shall be where these Beyer artifacts are today.

Power, arrogance and sex

HONOLULU—This just about sums up the essence of contemporary politics, not necessarily in that order. You can juggle the variables around, but however you define politics, you are bound to get one or two or three of the above in combination. Especially in a place like Capitol Hill in Washington, D.C. where lies the seat of power.

We thought we were through with the sleazy saga of former intern Monica Lewinsky. She should consider herself lucky because at least she got out of it alive.

COMMENTARY

Belinda A. Aquino

The current raging case of another former intern on the Hill, Chandra Levy, is once more titillating the public imagination, except that she may not be able to tell a grand jury her story. Her mysterious disappearance for several weeks now has not only raised alarm and suspicion, but the usual question about the vulnerability as well as expendability of women in the vicious circle of politics and powerful men. Was (or should that still be Is?) Chandra another naive, awe-struck young woman hoping to become important by dating a powerful representative old enough to be her father? Was she misled by her lover, who may have given the impression that he was going to marry her?

In the eye of the political storm is six-term California Rep. Gary Condit, who may not ring much of a bell on the Hill, but is a big "octopus" in his home district in central California. When his name first hit the headlines, there was a collective "Who?" from the national audience. It didn't take long for the story to unravel. And it would be a familiar story, resurrecting not only Bill Clinton but Gary Hart, Robert Packwood, Wayne Hays, Wilbur Mills and other once powerful men whose peccadilloes littered Capitol Hill.

Condit is 53, married and the son of a pastor in a family-values bastion of California, who is popularly known as a caring public servant concerned mainly with the welfare of the common folk. He is your "Mr. Nice Guy" next door ready to help anyone in distress. But in fact, that's just the exterior. There's some dark side beneath.

Gale Hammons, a writer for the Modesto (California) Bee, describes Condit as an "octopus" in his district, "enjoying a long, wide and deep reach," whose political machine "keeps a tented grip, behind the scenes, on local policy questions, election dynamics and candidate recruitment." He is at the helm of a political team that plays rough, according to Hammons, without remorse, intimidating real and potential opponents. "No one can beat him, so most people join him—which augments his power still more." That's politics in the raw. The joke is that Condit's approval rating is like God's when He gets around the district.

Seems like a Filipino invincible warlord politician who's there forever and ever? Hammons attributes Condit's "divine stature" to two factors, which are similar to the elements accounting for the persistence of warlordism in the Philippines. The first is extraordinary service to his constituency, which touches people in the gut. And he wasn't even an actor! If someone stopped by Condit's office with a runny nose, someone would hand over a tissue. Twelve years of that, notes Hammons, and you have an avalanche of loyalists. The politics of personal loyalty overwhelms whatever else you're thinking about the man. Did his followers know that Condit was or is a compulsive womanizer? More about this later.

The second reason is image, a carefully crafted PR job that has parlayed his humble beginnings to a seat in Congress with his handlers making sure that, despite his conservative "Blue Dog" Democrat credentials, Condit appeals to the broad political spectrum as a centrist. He has lasted this long with wide bipartisan support in his district.

In Washington, however, "Little Boy Blue" is actually a motorcycle-riding free spirit carousing in the Hill's vibrant nightlife, where you don't think you're 53 and over the hill. But reflecting on one level of understanding, not that his behavior should be condoned, who could blame him? Here is a guy living alone in his apartment, away from his family, and what is he to do on Friday evenings, for instance? About 80 percent of the congresspeople, the vast majority of whom are males, do not maintain a second home in Washington. They commute back to their home districts whenever they can. But for the most part, they are stuck with Washington's glittering nightlife with its temptations, and with plenty of Monicas and Chandras around as easy prey. Is the Hill culture one of preying and being preyed upon? Definitely both.

"This is the classic story about whether a powerful man can put himself above the law," notes another journalist, Maureen Dowd, "and about the unappetizing inequity of relationships in Washington between older married officials and young, needy women." For 10 weeks, Condit denied that he was having an affair with Chandra, shades of Clinton's wagging finger denying that he ever had sexual relations with that woman Monica Lewinsky! Only Chandra's parents' determined media campaign to flush out Condit made the latter admit to part of the truth, that he was indeed seeing Chandra. And more was to come. It's the proverbial you-get-deeper-in-the-hole syndrome.

Chandra's aunt came out of the woodwork as well, and gave an interview with The Washington Post. Dowd reports that Chandra's aunt gave "vivid, sad details of the secret liaison" with Condit, including the aunt's suggestion that she (Chandra) "try to please her lover by arranging his shirts by color and creating a cactus terrarium." Some aunt! Our classic "konsentidora." Did Chandra confide in her to begin with, just like Monica told all to Linda Tripp?

And as a situation like this would have it, more people are talking and telling. A minister in Condit's home district also came out with the information that his daughter, 18 years old at the time, had an affair with Condit, who warned her not to tell anybody about their relationship. The daughter, however, denied it. Who's telling the truth?

Then a flight attendant also went on TV to tell about her affair with Condit, who reportedly asked her to sign an affidavit denying their relationship. She gave some details which would convince anyone that she was not making it up.

More details of this sexual politics episode are bound to emerge. But it's amazing how the police keeps repeating that Condit is "not a suspect" in the case. Apparently, he took a lie detector test, and came out clean, but he arranged the test himself, sully its credibility. He has said very little, is very evasive and one gets the feeling that there's something left unsaid.

Something which may shed light on Chandra's sudden disappearance with no trace at all. A veritable massive "womanhunt" of even abandoned buildings has turned up nothing, not a clue. Does this have the makings of a perfect crime in the sleazy world of power, arrogance and sex?

Tithing and giving from one's heart

ELEONOR Suson of the Department of Political Science, University of the Philippines, Diliman, Quezon City argues her case quite strongly on the impropriety of tithing ("Skepticism on the 'ikapu'," PDI/6/6/01) but also shows lamentable ignorance of the issue.

To say that the Church has become profit-oriented is rather sweeping. Not all that involves money means business; it may simply be a matter of survival. "As a devoted Catholic for many years," Suson should have known by now that one does not pay for the celebration of the sacraments. On the one hand, Canon Law 848 clearly states that the minister "must always ensure that the needy are not deprived of the help of the sacraments by reason of poverty." One simply gives, offers or donates to the Church whatever is within his or her means. On the other hand, Canon Law 222, 1 says, "Christ's faithful have the obligation to provide for the needs of the Church, so that the Church has available to it those things which are necessary for divine worship, for apostolic and charitable work and for the worthy support of its members." Therefore, it speaks of a distorted priority for one who buys a case of beer at a child's baptismal party but offers, in the words of Suson, only the "barya-barya" to the Church under the pretext of poverty. Without offerings, chances are our priests will have to do moonlighting. Hyphenated priests, we call them: priest-engineer, priest-doctor, priest-technician, priest-salesman, priest-orchid vendor, priest-meat dealer. When that happens, "to fulfill the hunger and thirst of the spirit" will simply be an impossible dream.

Yes, there is a very long tradition of tithing that dates back to the Old Testament (among many other passages: Gen 14:20, Gen 28:22, Lev 27:30-34, Num 18:21-24). In the New Testament, Jesus is even more demanding. He condemned the Pharisees for being so self-righteous about having paid their tithes while, at the same time, neglecting "the weightier matters of the law, justice and mercy and good works." (Mt 23:23) His apostles left everything. "If a man wishes to come after me, he must deny his very self, take up his cross and follow in my steps." (Mt 8:34) In the life of the early Christian community, we note that the believers shared everything in common. "They would sell their property and goods, dividing everything on the basis of each one's need." (Acts 2:44-45) "Nor was there anyone needy among them, for all who owned property or houses sold them and donated the proceeds. They used to lay them at the feet of the apostles to be distributed to everyone according to his need." (Acts 4:34-35) The demands of Christian life are very radical. True, Christ never demanded tithes from his disciples. He was more radical. He needs our whole being (including sanctifying our time, work, resources, family, etc.).

Times have changed. It may be true that "neither the Vatican nor the priests are starving like so many of the poor," but we really don't have to wait for their starvation in order for us to give. It is alarming enough to have so many poor parishes. But it is even more alarming to see that only a few really give from the heart. We call ourselves Christians, but we cannot give our lives, our time, our property, not even a tenth of our income. We can give only the "barya-barya." St. Paul says: "Everyone must give according to what he has inwardly decided; not sadly, not grudgingly, for God loves a cheerful giver. God can multiply his favors among you so that you may always have enough of everything and even a surplus for good works." (2 Cor 9:7-8)—REV. FR. FERDINAND T. It takes three to make love perfect

IN FILING Senate Bill No. 782, Sen. Rodolfo Biazon proposes to legalize absolute divorce to end what he calls loveless marriages.

No more love? Only because we forget that it takes three to make a love perfect: husband, wife and God. Our own Constitution speaks in awe of the institution of marriage when it refers to its "sanctity," an attribute attached only to things divine. For it is the divine that ennobles love. And those who say that love is present only in the quickening of the glands or the tingling of bells deface man's nature. No wonder we say, there is no love. As Fulton

Sheen would say, "those who would separate the earthly sound from the heavenly harp can have no music... But they who see in all earthly beauty the faint copy of divine love, they who see fidelity to every vow—even when the other is untrue—a proof that God loves us who are so unlovable, they who in the face of their trials see that God's love ended in a cross, these will, even on earth, learn that love was made flesh and dwelled among us."—JO IMBONG, convenor, Mothers for Health, Home Empowerment and Reforms, Unit 101 Valle Verde Homes, Kaimito St., Pasig City

Column on strokes appreciated

I AM writing to express my most sincere thanks to Neal Cruz for his column last July 5 titled, "Good news for stroke patients." As a regular INQUIRER reader, I have known Cruz to be an astute political observer and commentator, but I was pleasantly surprised to discover that he can discuss the state-of-the-art medical developments at the level of the country's best medical columnists.

I found his article to be particularly relevant because my own dear mother suffered a minor stroke a month ago. She has fully recovered, though she is still a little weak. But our family is anxious over the possibility of a second and more severe stroke, as very well explained by Cruz, and subsequently confirmed by my mother's neurologist.

Now comes this drug, Perindopril, which is supposed to reduce the risk of stroke by up to 50 to 75 percent. I have always become skeptical about so-called "wonder drugs" but after reading Cruz's article, I have decided to revisit my mother's neurologist, so she can avail of the benefits of this new treatment.

In closing, a million thanks to Cruz and others like him, who through their writings, can claim to have had a very positive impact on the lives, health and well-being of ordinary people like us.—LALAINA A. RAPADAS, 13 Road 14, Project 8, Quezon City

Preparing for heavier traffic in Bicutan

WE take note of the letter of Ringo Morella of Parañaque City last June 29 regarding the inevitable "traffic monster rising in Bicutan" which the ongoing construction of the SM mall will create as soon as it opens.

Like Morella, we also anticipate the very foreseeable congestion which the structure will cause. However, at this point, with the construction already going on, the most that we can do is coordinate with the local government of Parañaque and the residents of that area to discuss the possible traffic management solutions.

We would like to thank Morella for his concern and to reiterate that the convenience of our tollway-using public will always be on top of our priorities.—LUIS SISON, chair and CEO, Philippine National Construction Corp., Edsa cor. Reliance Street, Mandaluyong City

Making sure the 'barako' survives

IT is quite heartening that in just a span of one week, two persons (Rina Lim of the University of the Philippines and Rommel Lalata) wrote letters about the need to resuscitate and the little steps they are taking to contribute in reviving the Philippines' dying coffee industry. I'm glad that more and more Filipinos have begun to appreciate Philippine coffee, particularly the famed Batangas barako.

On this note, I would like to share the Figaro Foundation's efforts in reviving our coffee industry, which we are doing through the revitalization of the barako, which is on the verge of extinction. The barako is one of the costliest casualties of the sorry fate of our coffee industry. Should we lose the barako, we would be losing an important part of our Filipino heritage.

That is why, since early last year, we have initiated projects to help the barako. One of them is Project Bean Aid, where those who would like to help the barako back on its feet can buy a bag of the blend and a barako tree will be planted in his or her name. And on July 21, we will be having our second Barako Tree Planting Tour, where coffee enthusiasts and other concerned individuals or corporations may take part in planting barako trees in Tagaytay. We need to plant 50,000 barako trees in the next five years to ensure its survival.—PACITA U. Aussie justice will catch Gonzaleses' killers

THE MURDERS of lawyer Teddy Gonzales, his wife Lowiva and daughter Clodine on the night of July 10 at their home in Sydney shocked the Filipino community in Australia. I heard about it first on radio. Because of the medication I was taking, I could not report on the murders.

Since I worked in Australia as a journalist in April 1993, I have never reported anything similar to it. But one thing is sure to happen: the police will arrest the suspect or suspects who will not be presented to the media and Australia's justice system will provide the victims fair justice because, unlike in the Philippines, there you cannot bribe prosecutors and judges. Judges usually render their decisions after the prosecutor and the defense counsel rest their case; the written decision follows.

Our police, the National Bureau of Investigation, prosecutors and soldiers think that their jobs are done when they present the suspects to the media. This is wrong because the media are not part of a judicial system, and the police, NBI and soldiers violate the human rights of the suspects who are presumed innocent until proven guilty.

When I was visiting San Jose City, Nueva Ecija, the hometown of my wife Rosette, Rep. Eleuterio Violago told me that he would be happy if our police, prosecutors and judges could not be bribed and justice would not be delayed.—OSCAR R. LANDICHO, orlandicho@hotmail.com

The world has truly gone to the dogs

IN A HISTORIC (yet infamous) ruling of the Chilean Appeals Court, the tribunal has decided in favor of Augusto Pinochet, stating that the former strongman is "mentally unfit" to stand trial and defend himself from the charges filed against him for human rights abuses. Subscribing to the arguments of the defense that Pinochet's previous strokes and heart attacks have caused him to suffer from mild dementia, the court, in effect, exempted him from prosecution.

But while this may initially seem as an isolated case (confined to a small country 30 hours away from Manila), it nonetheless sets an ominous and ignominious precedent for the country and its legal institutions. For only a day after the Chilean ruling was the arraignment of former Philippine President Joseph Estrada. Charged with economic plunder amounting to P4 billion, his arraignment process took on the characteristics of the Kafkaesque and the surreal, with the counsel of the accused saying that Republic Act 7080 or the Plunder Law was unconstitutional—which was ironically the very same law Estrada himself had co-authored when he was still a senator.

While the nature of the accusations are different—with Pinochet charged with committing human rights violations and with Estrada suspected of amassing ill-gotten wealth—the comical bent of the proceedings and the more compromising bent of the incumbent governments have become dangerously similar. And with former Justice Secretary Serafin Cuevas joining Estrada's defense team, the possibility of an acquittal is not far-fetched. As foreign observers have noted, the likelihood of the Pinochet trial losing momentum was just a matter of time. This may yet happen in Estrada's plunder case.

In the end, it is uncertain who among the three is truly mad: Pinochet with his "mild" dementia, the Chilean court for believing in the ex-dictator's conjectures, or Estrada for violating his own plunder law? Strange world, isn't it?—MARY AILEEN BACALSO, secretary general, Asian Federation Against Involuntary Disappearances c/o FIND-Philippines, 50 K-8th St., West Kamias, Quezon City

Wrong image and message

COMING home from a late afternoon class in PE 1, Foundations of Physical Fitness, where because of the growing number of smokers, both male and female from among our youth, I delivered an inspired lecture on the dangers of smoking, I was elated to see in the six o'clock news a proposed bill which will make illegal the purchasing and smoking of cigarettes, by minors, 16 years old and under. The justification for the bill includes statistics such as 99 percent of those who have lung cancer contracted the disease from smoking; nine Filipinos every hour or 4,570 million a year die of heart disease where cigarette smoking is a predisposing factor; two Filipinos a day or 20,000 a year die due to smoking; annual government income from tobacco products is P21 million while annual expenditure by the government for the treatment and medical care of patients who are sick or dying because of smoking is P46 million; billions of dollars worth of class suits filed in court against cigarette manufacturers in the United States have been decided in favor of complainants.

Toward the end of the newscast, I was shocked to see President Gloria Macapagal-Arroyo wearing a hard hat and gracing the groundbreaking ceremonies of a cigarette manufacturing facility! Are we that desperate in wanting to project a favorable image of foreign investments still coming into our country, that we permit the entry of a business venture, proven with glaring and indisputable facts, to be a losing proposition and posing a great danger to the physical fitness, health and well-being of our youth and people?—APARICIO H. Summit fails at 11th hour

AGRA, India—India and Pakistan scrambled yesterday to explain how their leaders failed to reach any accord on their half-century dispute over Kashmir, as Kashmiris braced for renewed violence in the Himalayan province.

"We had high hopes from the summit that it would bring peace to Kashmir," said 16-year-old student Naveed Bashir as he waited for his school bus in the Himalayan province. "But unfortunately, the failure of the talks means more violence, death and destruction."

Late Monday night, Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf met for an hour with Indian Prime Minister Atal Bihari Vajpayee in one final attempt to salvage the three-day summit. As midnight approached, however, neither side was willing to budge and Musharraf departed for the airport and flew back to Pakistan without any agreement or joint statement issued.

It appeared that the stumbling blocks involved language over how to describe the dispute over Kashmir and the militants that India calls terrorists and Pakistan calls freedom fighters. Neither government was specific about the final obstacle.

India's foreign and defense minister Jaswant Singh said Vajpayee had "firmly tried to raise the question of terrorism. . . . If such an understanding by Pakistan existed on terrorism, this situation (of no accord) wouldn't have arisen."

The governments stunned summit delegates from both South Asian countries and more than 1,000 journalists from around the world who had been told all day to prepare for a joint declaration by the two leaders that would cover new ground on Kashmir, security, terrorism and narcotics.

Instead, a spokesperson for the Indian government gave a terse, one-sentence statement that no agreement was reached.

The summit "certainly was inspired by the expectation . . . that there would be accommodation, understanding and movement forward," Singh told a news conference yesterday.

"Complex negotiations and discussions hang by a thread," he said. "We made every effort to arrive at an agreed text. I don't want to say how close we were or far we were."

Noting that Musharraf had invited Vajpayee to visit Pakistan, Singh added, "I would not treat this as the end of the exercise. Our commitment to peace, dialogue, and amity between the two countries remains."

"The caravan of peace will continue on its march and on some auspicious day it will reach its destination," said Singh.

Pakistan's Information Minister Anwar Mahmood yesterday said Musharraf was "very, very disappointed and hurt that he and Vajpayee had agreed to everything, they had settled on an agreement and six hours later it was in tatters." AP

Doctors upbeat about artificial heart prospects

LOUISVILLE, Ky.—Surgeons said on Monday they were encouraged by the progress of the world's first self-contained artificial heart recipient and believed the device was working well enough to proceed with a second implant.

Dr. Robert Dowling, who helped implant the experimental device at Jewish Hospital in Louisville, Kentucky, said he was encouraged by early results from the trial and said the next such implant for his team could come within a week or two.

"For at least the next week or two, our resources, our human resources, are limited. We need to put a lot of energy into our current patient. It will be a week or two before we do another implant," Dowling said.

Earlier on Monday, Dowling and fellow surgeon Laman Gray said the heart recipient showed improvement in his liver, lung and kidney function and had begun mild exercises to rebuild muscle tone lost to the end-stages of heart failure.

Both said the patient, whose identity is secret but is described as a diabetic man in his 50s, has done better than they had expected before the surgery. But they cautioned that the patient is extremely sick and will be so for a very long time.

"We can have trouble with everything else, but we're not having troubles with this heart," Gray said referring to the heart's performance despite the patient's weakened condition.

He told a news briefing that the patient's condition prior to the surgery was "as far in end-stage heart disease as anybody can be."

The doctors said the patient's kidney function has returned to where it was a year ago, and his liver was functioning at near-normal levels, which was better than they had hoped. His lung function, a key concern in any heart surgery, also looked good, they said.

Since the implant, he has had various complications including a procedure early on to stop internal bleeding around the grapefruit-sized, titanium and plastic device. Last week, doctors drained fluid from around the device's battery pack and the patient was placed back on a ventilator. Reuters

US may grant amnesty to 3M Mexican illegals

WASHINGTON—A plan that could grant legal status to up to 3 million Mexicans living illegally in the United States is being weighed by the administration of President George W. Bush in one of the largest amnesty programs ever considered.

Many details remain to be worked out and no decision is imminent, Bush's spokesperson said.

Despite potential problems, press secretary Ari Fleischer said Monday that Bush was committed to working with the Mexican government to ease "what has been a disorderly process" along the 3,200-km border.

The administration's review touched off a lively political debate.

Mexican President Vicente Fox, who has urged Bush to consider legalization steps, welcomed the development. Speaking Monday to the Economic Club of Chicago, Fox said he is committed to "as many rights as possible for as many Mexican immigrants as possible as soon as possible."

A task force of top Justice and State Department officials prepared a report for the White House outlining options for overhauling US immigration policies toward Mexico.

A broad grant of amnesty for illegal Mexicans already living in this country was among the options cited by the task force, but the report did not include specific recommendations or spell out a timetable, administration aides said.

Fleischer said that "regularization of undocumented Mexicans in the United States" was being weighed.

Border safety issues will be considered in any immigration overhaul he said. He also suggested that a new program for guest workers—those who are working only temporarily in the United States—was being crafted.

Congressional conservatives have opposed anything beyond allowing Mexicans to stay as temporary laborers. The consideration of even limited amnesty is a divisive political issue, particularly in border states and among Republicans in Congress. AP

Jiang warns US it risks unleashing new arms race

MOSCOW—Chinese President Jiang Zemin yesterday called for a new world order to counter US hegemony, and warned the United States that it risked unleashing a new arms race through its disputed missile defense plans.

Jiang, on the third day of a state visit to Russia during which Moscow and Beijing signed a historic friendship treaty, said the two nations bore a major responsibility for maintaining world peace.

"No country can develop its own security by harming the fundamental security interests of others. We must dispel the Cold War mentality and eradicate the theory of superior weapons," the Chinese leader told a packed hall of students at Moscow State University.

"To destroy the global strategic balance and develop new cutting-edge weapons systems will only start a new arms race and endanger world peace," he warned in the presence of Russian President Vladimir Putin.

China and Russia have led opposition to the ambitious US project to build a space-based missile defense shield to ward off incoming missile attacks from so-called "rogue states" such as North Korea and Iraq.

Worried that it could be used against their own strategic arsenal, they say that it will destroy the global security architecture of the last three decades by violating the 1972 Anti-Ballistic Missile (ABM) Treaty.

In a clear message to Washington that Russia and China will act together to counter its role as the world's only superpower, Jiang said that only an international order based on "equality could guarantee global peace.

"Each country and region must establish a complete system of security based on mutual trust, mutual benefit, equality and consultations as its core. Only in this way can we maintain a peaceful, stable and prosperous world," he said.

The United States on Monday had given a cautious welcome to the signing of the new 20-year Russia-China friendship accord, saying it posed no particular threat and might even be in Washington's interest.

The broad Good Neighborly Treaty of Friendship and Cooperation, replacing an outdated 1950 version that failed to prevent a 1969 border war, commits China and Russia to "mutual efforts to support global strategic balance and stability."

CHINESE President Jiang Zemin (left) exchanges documents with Russian President Vladimir Putin in Moscow, July 16. The leaders of China and Russia said they wanted the 1972 Anti-Ballistic Missile pact between Moscow and Washington to be preserved unchanged as a basis of international stability.

Seoul hurls new salvo in book row with Japan MPs, troops to defy Wahid clampdown

SEOUL—South Korea yesterday said it would ask Japan to remove names of Korean war dead from a controversial shrine in Tokyo, in a move likely to further strain relations between the two countries.

The South Korean request follows Seoul's decision last week to impose a series of sanctions in protest at Tokyo's authorization of new school history textbooks which critics say whitewash the history of Japan's military aggression in Asia before and during World War II.

It was not known until 1991 that more than 21,000 of the war dead commemorated at the Yasukuni Shrine in central Tokyo were Koreans.

The shrine is controversial because it includes the names of fourteen war criminals convicted by the Allies after World War II along with nearly 2.5 million ordinary Japanese who died in that and other wars.

Visits to the shrine by Japanese leaders, which were taboo up until the mid-1980's, prompt regular protests from Asian states.

Relatives of the Koreans listed at Yasukuni have been demanding the removal of their names from the shrine, where the war dead are individually listed on either scrolls or bound books made from traditional washi paper.

Most of the Koreans enshrined at Yasukuni are thought to have been conscripted as forced labor or soldiers and are listed under Japanese names they were forced to adopt.

"The government will soon make an official request to Japan to return the memorials to the Korean victims," an official of the ministry of foreign affairs and trade said.

"It is nonsensical that the memorials of Koreans are kept in the Yasukuni Shrine alongside those of A-class Japanese war criminals," he said.

JAKARTA—Indonesian MPs were gathering here yesterday and thousands of troops were on stand-by ready for a snap impeachment hearing if President Abdurrahman Wahid declares a state of emergency.

"About 80 percent of national assembly members are already in Jakarta," the Golkar party's leader in the assembly, Fahmi Idris, said.

"The rest are now travelling to the capital, and 90 percent will be here by Thursday."

Wahid has threatened to declare a state of emergency at 6 p.m. Friday and dissolve parliament unless his opponents drop their efforts to impeach him.

All 695 members of the national assembly or MPR had been instructed to stay close to the parliament for an emergency impeachment session at an hour's notice, Indonesian Democratic Party of Struggle (PDIP) legislator Heri Achmadi said.

"They have all been placed on alert to be ready to gather for a snap impeachment hearing within one hour of any emergency declaration by the president," he said.

A special session of the MPR, Indonesia's top legislature, is scheduled to start impeachment hearings against Wahid on Aug. 1 at the behest of the lower house, on the grounds of alleged incompetence and his possible involvement in two financial scandals.

But assembly leaders have urged MPs to be prepared for a snap session if Wahid carries out his threat.

Early Tuesday 6,000 soldiers and police staged a show of force at the parliament complex in a preview of the heavy security planned for the impeachment hearing.

Twenty armored cars, 12 fast troop carriers, two helicopters, and 500 vehicles including trucks, cars and motorcycles were deployed in and around the complex.

A total of 42,000 police and military personnel will be deployed across the capital during the special session, of which 6,000 would guard the parliament, police said.

Plans have also been devised to evacuate MPs by helicopter to an "undisclosed location" if the session is disrupted, Jakarta Gov. Sutiyoso said.

Rwanda genocide suspects worked for UN tribunal

UNITED NATIONS—The UN court investigating the 1994 genocide in Rwanda said on Monday it had taken four investigators off its payroll because, like the defendants they worked for, they were suspected of war crimes.

The disclosure was a fresh blow to the International Criminal Tribunal on Rwanda, already under fire for being behind schedule and bogged down in bureaucratic infighting.

The court is based in the Tanzanian town of Arusha and is hearing cases stemming from the 1994 slaughter of up to a million Tutsis and moderate Hutus by Hutu troops and militias.

It issued a statement saying it would not renew employment contracts for the four investigators as three of them were named on a Rwandan government list of genocide suspects while the fourth was under investigation by a court prosecutor for possible involvement in atrocities.

The investigators were part of defense teams paid by the court to represent indigent suspects.

"The court wants to provide high-quality legal representation for all the defendants," said UN spokesperson Farhan Haq.

"A lot of the people who were senior in the Rwandan justice system either fled, were killed, or in some cases participated in genocide. There were a large number of people involved," Haq said. "The problem is finding out who the guilty are, and that process is still going on."

The contracts of three of the investigators had expired and would not be renewed while the fourth was being suspended, the court said.

The tribunal, which has been plagued by administrative difficulties, has tried only a handful of people for genocide, among them former Rwandan Prime Minister Jean Kambanda, who was sentenced to life in prison.

International groups have criticized the court for failing to bring the alleged masterminds of the genocide to trial.

Amnesty International said recently the lack of experience in running a court had led to inefficiency and confusion, unacceptable delays and, in at least one case, a breach of confidential information.

2 rebels killed in Mindoro

BY JOEL JABAL
PDI Southern Luzon Bureau

CALAPAN CITY—At least two rebels were killed in a clash between a New People's Army group and soldiers of the Southern Luzon Command's Task Force Banahaw early Tuesday in Mansalay, Oriental Mindoro.

The battle site in Sitio Tumbaga, Barangay Panaytayan, some 180 kilometers south of this city, was where Army Maj. Noel Buan was believed held. Buan was released in April in Sitio Bait, also in Panaytayan, a Mangyan community.

The area was also believed to be where NPA spokesperson Gregorio "Ka Roger" Rosal is now based.

Col. Danilo Fabian, Solcom spokesperson, said soldiers of the 16th Infantry Battalion recovered the bodies of the unidentified rebels, who belonged to the NPA's Regional Guerrilla Unit led by a certain Kumander Lawin.

They also found two M-16 rifles and other NPA paraphernalia.

In Compostela Valley, an Army sergeant and two militiamen were killed when an ambush by about 30 NPA rebels in Barangay Anibungan, Maco town on Saturday.

Army Col. Felipe Berroya, 701st Infantry Division chief, said soldiers of the 60th IB under Maj. Roger Madalogdog were riding in a military vehicle when they were attacked.

Killed were Sgt. Verbo Castillo, and Orlando Anticamara and Bernie Cinda, members of the Citizens Armed Forces Geographical Unit.

Berroya said the government troops engaged the rebels in an hour-long exchange of gunfire until military reinforcements arrived, forcing the rebels to withdraw. With a report from Anthony Allada, PDI Mindanao Bureau

Isabela farmers oppose field testing of Bt corn

ILAGAN, Isabela—Farmers and concerned residents are opposing the field testing of Bt corn, a genetically modified crop, in 10 towns of the province.

The opposition was formalized during a public hearing here Monday as the municipal councils of four of the 10 towns targeted for field tests passed resolutions supporting the activity.

Members of the provincial board said they would study the reasons cited by those opposing and supporting the field testing before deciding on its endorsement.

The proposed field testing activities would be done in 11 villages covering a total of 22,100 hectares of agricultural land.

Monsanto, a multinational agricultural firm that initiated the project, would let loose Yieldgard Bt corn seeds injected with the organism called Bacillus thuringiensis in 32 proposed sites in the country, including those in Isabela.

The project aims to confirm the resistance of Bt corn to the Asiatic corn borer, evaluate its economic value and assess its grain quality.

The villages where the field tests are scheduled are Carulay in Echague, Alanguigan 2nd and San Felipe in Ilagan, Sili in Aurora, Villaluna in Cauayan, Diarao in Jones, Masaya Sur in San Agustin, Malamag West in Tumauni, Napuecu Pequeño in Reina Mercedes, Yeban Sur in Benito Soliven, and Garita in Cabagan.

The municipal councils of Cabagan, Echague, Tumauni and Jones have approved resolutions endorsing the field tests in their areas.

The Bt corn is considered a genetically modified crop. GMOs are animals or plants conceived through bioengineering.

Prof. Romeo Quijano of the University of the Philippines assailed the proponents of the field tests for ignoring public health and safety.

He said that among the side effects on users of GMO-enhanced products are the possible spread of cancer.

"It would be better to uphold the environment's beauty and safeguard people's health than embarking on a short-term development," he said. Dr. Charito Medina, a UP College Los Baños entomologist, said further study of the effects of Bt corn-laced seeds was needed before doing the field tests and selling the seeds to farmers.

Danilo Tumamao, Cagayan Valley Agricultural Regional Center chief, welcomed the proposed field testing in Isabela.

He expressed confidence that Bt corn yields would increase by 30 to 69 percent compared with ordinary corn varieties, like the IPB-911 and the Super Sweet Corn.

The increase in harvests was first reported in General Santos City where initial field tests were held last year.

Tumamao and other Bt corn test proponents said the crop's leaves and stalks were free from borers, its grains clean and undamaged, its yield increase would reach 9 percent, and the plants could withstand adverse weather conditions.

The 3,000-strong Dangayan Dagiti Mannalon iti Isabela, a province-wide farmers' organization, asked Gov. Faustino Dy Jr. to oppose the field testing, saying it was "environmentally poisonous." Villamor Visaya Jr., PDI Northern Luzon Bureau

Mindoreños laud mining pact revocation

BY JOEL JABAL
PDI Southern Luzon Bureau

CALAPAN CITY—Environmentalists and anti-mining advocates hailed the decision of Environment Secretary Heherson Alvarez to revoke the mineral production sharing agreement (MPSA) of Aglubang Mining Corp./Crew Minerals Philippines (CMP).

"This is a victory of the people," said Evelyn Cacha, provincial chair of the Alliance against Mining (Alamin).

"We don't need cobalt and nickel. Our people need something to eat," she said.

Oriental Mindoro Rep. Alfonso Umali Jr. (2nd District) said he had never lost hope that the MPSA, approved last December by then Environment Secretary Antonio Cerilles, would be cancelled.

Alvarez announced the revocation of the 25-year agreement in a press conference Monday in Quezon City. The MPSA covers more than 9,000 hectares near the boundary of Victoria, Oriental Mindoro and Sablayan, Occidental Mindoro.

"If the mining operations will continue, we will suffer flooding worse than the one we experienced in 1993," Bishop Warlito Cajandig said.

Environment Undersecretary Gregorio Cabantac said Alvarez's decision could be considered a "landmark ruling to guide mining operations in the future."

Cabantac said the DENR evaluation team found that the mining area is traversed by two active earthquake faults, is located in a critical watershed, overlaps with areas being claimed by Mangyans as ancestral domain, and is being claimed to be a Tamaraw Reservation Area.

He said Alvarez saw for himself that the mining area was indeed inside a watershed, the source of the Mag-Asawang Tubig which supplies water to two major irrigation projects in Naujan town and this city.

The company said it was willing to invest $35 billion to develop the nickel and cobalt project.

Journalists to march today

CITY OF SAN FERNANDO, Pampanga—Fifty journalists in Pampanga vowed to wear red shirts when they march to the provincial capitol here today to demand a public apology from Board Member Crisostomo Garbo for acts "inimical to the pursuit of press freedom."

The Capitol Press Corps, the Pampanga chapters of the National Press Club, the Kapisanan ng mga Brodkaster sa Pilipinas and the Angeles City Press and Radio Club have also asked the Bureau of Immigration to verify Garbo's citizenship.

Garbo angered the journalists when he said in a speech at Wednesday's provincial board session that capitol reporters were behind the "imaginary rift" between Gov. Manuel Lapid and Vice Gov. Juan Miguel Arroyo.

Chris Navarro, Sun*Star Pampanga reporter-photographer, said Garbo also pressured reporters to reveal their sources of stories disclosing the "pre-scripted" session that had maneuvered the selection of heads of powerful board committees.

Reporters learned that Arroyo and some board members, in meetings held before the elections, had already chosen who was to get what committees, violating the policy of transparency that the vice governor had laid down.

Garbo, who became Arroyo's ally early into the campaign trail, got the chairmanship of the powerful committee on appropriations.

Other board members cornered committee chairmanships except Robert David, a Lapid ally who felt "strangely left out."

Apologetic, Garbo said he was "taken by emotions."

Arroyo appealed to reporters to be more "responsible" in exercising fairness in reporting provincial affairs. Tonette Orejas and Jun Malig, PDI Central Luzon Desk

Traders warned on fake ad agents

A PAMPANGA newspaper publisher has warned businessmen and government offices against dealing with bogus advertising agents who are using the Central Luzon Weekly Mirror (CLM) or the non-existent Metropolitan Mirror in their swindling activities.

Jerry Lacuerta, CLM publisher and editor, said a syndicate, headed by a woman, has been soliciting ads in Pampanga without authority from the newspaper.

Lacuarta said the group has duped small businessmen, mostly fishpond operators, fingerling breeders, cooking oil producers, and animal feed makers in remote villages.

He said that among the recent victims who complained to him were a cooking oil manufacturer in San Simon who paid P750; a small tomato planter in Arayat, P500; and a feed producer in Lambac, Guagua, P3,500.

Lacuarta said the woman, described by the victims as a "sweet talker," had obtained blank forms of CLM ad contracts from Angel Camiling, a former advertising agent of the newspaper, and reproduced the documents.

Lacuarta said Camiling recruited the woman as partner in soliciting ads sometime last year. It was then that CLM started receiving complaints from some businessmen who did not see their ads in the newspaper.

Lacuarta said the group was also soliciting ads for the non-existent Metropolitan Mirror, which was planned to be a sister publication of the CLM in Metro Manila.

SC dismisses judge

TUGUEGARAO CITY—The Supreme Court has dismissed a judge in Cagayan for allowing a payoff between litigants in court premises in 1996. It also ordered the forfeiture of government benefits of Judge Dominador Garcia of the municipal trial court in Tuao. In a decision issued last week, the high court said Garcia allowed the use of his sala for a payoff between two Tuao policemen and a suspected gun wielder on Oct. 30, 1996. Villamor Visaya Jr., PDI Northern Luzon Bureau

Rapist gets death

LA TRINIDAD, Benguet—For the first time in this capital town's history, a court sentenced a man to death for raping his 10-year-old stepdaughter. Judge Francis Buliyat of the regional trial court said the man should die by lethal injection for sexually abusing the girl three times in 1997 and 1998 in Taloy Sur in Tuba, Benguet. In a decision issued on July 2, Buliyat ordered the man to pay his victim P375,000 in damages. Buliyat said 80 percent of at least 60 pending rape cases in Benguet involved child victims. Joya Santos Doctor, PDI Northern Luzon Bureau

SC tests camera use

LA TRINIDAD, Benguet—The Supreme Court is testing the use of modern visual equipment to ease the fear and discomfort of child rape victims while testifying in court. Amadeo Degay, assistant clerk of court for Benguet, said the high court was thinking of installing cameras inside the judge's chamber where victims of child rape will testify. Viewing screens will be put up inside the courtroom. Degay said that under the present system, the child faced the accused rapist, along with several others, making it difficult for her to testify during the trial. Joya Santos Doctor, PDI Northern Luzon Bureau

Calamity funds sought

SAN FERNANDO CITY—Ilocos officials appealed to President Macapagal-Arroyo to order the immediate release of calamity funds, including internal revenue allotments of provinces, for the rehabilitation of towns ravaged by Typhoon "Feria" in the region early this month. Senior Supt. Arturo Lomibao, Regional Disaster Coordinating Council chair, said Pangasinan, La Union, Ilocos Sur and Ilocos Norte needed at least P1 million each as initial financial aid and P500,000 each for the region's eight cities. *Peter La. Villagers feast on logs swept away by 'Feria'

BY CRISTINA ARZADON
PDI Northern Luzon Bureau

BANNA, Ilocos Norte—While typhoon victims in Ilocos Norte are still probably cursing "Feria," villagers here are going gaga over what they consider "a gift" from the recent calamity.

Residents have feasted on hundreds of trees swept downstream by flashfloods at the height of the typhoon early this month.

The felled trees—an array of various species from mahogany, acacia, damortis to arro-o—were found spread across the Bongo River, which also traverses the neighboring towns of Nueva Era and Marcos.

Heaps of uprooted trees and broken logs clogged the river channel and swamped nearby farming areas.

Residents say the trees were swept from the Surong Valley in Nueva Era and carried by strong water current to the Bongo River that straddles Banna all the way to Marcos.

Due to the weight of the trees, 50 hectares of farmland in four villages here were flooded when the river overflowed or its channel diverted creating a new spillway from adjacent fields, they said.

A farmer said they pulled the trees ashore for their own use.

"This is our only relief from our losses. We cannot allow anyone to claim these trees. We will keep them as our own," the farmer said.

Banna Mayor Jaime Abadilla, amazed by the volume of trees that swamped the river, said even 50 10-wheel trucks would not be enough to haul all the trees because of their sizes and quantity.

"I cannot say whether these trees are manna from heaven or a disaster," Abadilla said, noting that while the trees caused farmland to be silted when the river overflowed, residents have found materials to rebuild damaged houses.

"Let's just say the trees came as a reward to affected residents," he added.

However, Abadilla, expressing suspicions that some of the trees may have been illegally cut, told reporters he wanted these to be kept as evidence for the Department of Environment and Natural Resources to assess.

He shared the residents' observation that a large fraction of the trees seemed to have been previously cut as shown by the absence of branches and roots in some trees.

"This is incredible. We are calling (on) the DENR to determine who should answer for this," Abadilla said.

Nueva Era officials have adopted an internal arrangement allowing farmers to keep the trees as long as they live within the river's surrounding areas.

The arrangement was reached after the DENR reportedly gave permission to local officials to allow the residents to get what they need even without securing salvage permits from the agency.

Nueva Era Councilor Jose Valente, however, said priority would be given to those affected by the typhoon.

Farmers lost no time in looking for what they can salvage from the rare find.

Armed with chainsaws, the farmers took to the river and cut the trees into slabs. They etched markings on those they could not work on for the day to signify that the trees have already been owned.

Valente denied that illegal logging in his town caused the trees to be swept away from the mountains.

He said the trees were uprooted when a portion of the mountain slope eroded during the typhoon.

2 dead men dumped in lahar area

BY TONETTE OREJAS
PDI Central Luzon Desk

MINALIN, Pampanga—Of late, Pampanga's lahar fields have become the favorite dumping ground of suspected victims of summary executions, police reports showed.

Children playing along the Sta. Catalina section of the San Fernando-Sto. Tomas-Minalin tail dike found two dead men there on Friday last week.

The heads of the men were wrapped in packaging tape. Their necks were strangled with nylon rope, the children said.

Police said one of the men bore a card identifying him as Marvin Grafiza, 19, of Bayombong, Nueva Vizcaya. The other man, also about the same age, remained unidentified.

For villagers who fought in a people power-like manner the attempts by disposal firms to throw garbage here, the discovery of dead bodies drew angry reactions.

"They used to dump garbage here that we always resisted. Now, they're dumping the dead in our village. This is bad," Dominga Mendoza, a resident in Sta. Catalina, said.

In Bacolor town, which lies north of Minalin, farmers on July 12 discovered a half-naked dead woman along the San Isidro segment of the 56-km long FVR Megadike.

Police said the woman, who appeared to be between 18 and 22 years old stood at 5 feet 3 inches, remained unidentified.

CRUDE RIVER CROSSING

Children make their way across a jetty over the Cagayan de Oro River. The structure was installed in preparation for the construction of a bridge. Local historians and anthropologists are opposing the bridge project, saying it would affect archeological efforts near the area.

Egg basket's fate blamed on DPWH

MINALIN, Pampanga—Typhoon "Feria's" fury spared most parts of Pampanga, but it left this coastal town, the egg basket of Central Luzon, in a state of calamity.

Feria's floodwaters, coming from three rivers, drained through this town, bursting the unfinished San Fernando-Sto. Tomas-Minalin tail dike.

From a 30-meter gap three weeks ago, the dike's damaged segment widened to 70 meters on Monday, forcing more floodwaters to swamp Minalin, according to Mayor Edgar Flores.

More than 3,000 families in seven villages are still under two to three feet of floodwaters that have turned murky, he said.

But more than the floods, it was the "inaction" of the Department of Public Works and Highways' Mount Pinatubo Rehabilitation Project Management Office (MPR-PMO) that has prompted the municipal board to declare a state of calamity, Flores said.

Requests by residents and officials to immediately repair the damaged dike have fallen on deaf ears, Pampanga Rep. Juan Pablo Bondoc said.

Amando Ramirez, head of the DPWH MPR-PMO office, said he has repeatedly urged R-II Builders, the construction firm which won the project to strengthen the dike, to repair the structure.

Bondoc and Board Member Nestor Tolentino have asked the Commission on Audit last week to audit the project funds. The two officials also asked the DPWH to compel R-II Builders to explain why it was not repairing the damaged section.

"We were expecting that they would maximize the non-rainy days for the repair. To date, no equipment has moved and no action has been taken. Since this is already the rainy season, more than 40,000 residents in my district (fourth district) including those in Minalin, will deal with more serious and longer flooding," Bondoc said.

Post-election hostilities have made the situation worse. Former mayor Santiago Yabut withdrew the truck, which he owns, that the town uses during evacuation.

Financial records were also missing from the municipal offices, making it difficult for newly elected officials to determine how much money was available for relief assistance, Flores said.

Tolentino has asked the provincial government to allot emergency funds to the town. Flores has asked town residents, especially the rich, to pool local resources like food, medicines, potable water and vehicles. Tonette Orejas, PDI Central Luzon Desk

Negros sugar farm overseer, son killed

BY CARLA P. GOMEZ
PDI Visayas Bureau

BACOLOD CITY—A sugar farm overseer and his son were stabbed dead yesterday by two men inside a jeepney in Sagay City, 82.5 km north of here.

Killed were Gerardo Javelosa, 63, a cousin of Sagay Mayor Fortunato Javelosa, and his son Fernando, 30.

Gerardo's daughter Shiela, 26, suffered stab wounds in the hands.

Policemen were able to arrest one of the suspects, identified as Andres Siacor, an hour after the attack.

Siacor, 45, is the administrator of a sugar farm disputed by the employer of the older Javelosa and Siacor's employer, Leticia Baylon.

Supt. Modesto Sanson, Sagay police chief, said the attack could have been triggered by revenge for a previous killing.

On June 22, about 20 armed men killed farm worker Margarito Torres and wounded Arnel Bernales and Alex Siacor, who were staying in the farm house of Baylon in Hacienda Luga.

Among the suspects in the ambush were the Javelosas.

Andres Siacor, the cousin of Alex, runs the 24-hectare Hacienda Luga, a sugar farm claimed by Baylon in Barangay Baviera, Sagay.

Javelosa was claiming the property in behalf of his employer, a certain Gen. Emilio Luga, who lives in Manila.

Gerardo and his two children were riding in a jeepney owned by their relative from Barangay Bato, Sagay, on the way to the town proper when they were attacked at about 6:30 a.m.

The Javelosas were seated in the back of the jeep when a passenger got off along the highway at Barangay Lopez Jaena.

Two men at a waiting shed chased the slow-moving jeep, got inside the vehicle and stabbed the victims, said Sanson.

He said Sheila tried to ward off the assailants.

Gerardo and Fernando were declared dead on arrival at the Lopez District Planters Foundation Hospital.

Cargo vessel sinks

DAVAO CITY—An interisland cargo vessel docked at the Sasa Wharf here sank after it was rammed by a bigger Singaporean vessel early yesterday.

The 25 crewmembers of the MV Dingalan Bay and their wives escaped unhurt. Badjaos helped those who had difficulty in swimming.

The 1,479-ton Dingalan Bay, which was loaded with iron bars, canned goods and plastic products, docked at the wharf at 1 a.m.

Its captain, Alfredo Sarturio, said they were about to take their breakfast when the Singapore-based MV Pacific Eagle hit their vessel.

Lino Victorino, skipper of the 8,533-ton Pacific Eagle owned by C.F. Sharp Shipping Corp., was loaded with cars, accessories, and other imported goods.

Wharf security guard Romualdo Mariano said the Pacific Eagle was docking beside the Dingalan Bay when the accident happened.

Coast Guard Capt. Crisolito Agustin said damages could reach millions of pesos and their clean-up operation would run for days.

Based on preliminary investigation, the skipper of the Singaporean ship, Ahmaed Hashim, a Bangladeshi, had acknowledged having problems with the steering wheel and engine. Anthony Allada and Joel Escovilla, PDI Mindanao Bureau, and AFP

Divorce, Cordillera style

BY DESIREE CALUZA
BenguetI REMEMBER an Ifugao friend from Banaue telling me in jest that she wanted to get married in a traditional Ifugao wedding ceremony.

My friend said she wanted to do this because in marriages formalized in indigenous communities in the Cordillera, it would be easy to get out of marriage, or get a "divorce," if circumstances did not allow the marriage to work out.

I never believed her.

In my visits to Cordillera communities, I would always notice that traditional weddings are the grandest and the most colorful of community events. Merrymaking fills the air while tapuey (rice wine) or basi (sugarcane wine) flows.

I never imagined that the concept of divorce, which is perceived to be a Western practice, could reach as far as the hinterland communities of Mt. Province, Ifugao, Kalinga and Benguet.

I tried to track down my friend from Banaue to confirm if it is indeed true that "divorce" exists in indigenous communities. Instead of finding her, I ended up with another friend, Manny Ngilit, a native of Lagawe, Ifugao.

Divorce does exist in Cordillera communities, he said.

"In our place, you call it bolhe. Actually, this has been the practice of our forefathers who wanted to get out of marriage," Ngilit said.

In Ifugao, infertility and domestic violence are among the grounds for divorce. But infertility has always been noted as the most common reason cited by Ifugao couples in separations.

"Having a child is a very big factor for a family. So it is their belief that it is useless living together if you do not have any children," Ngilit said.

For many Igorot families, having children means opportunities for a better life for the community that basically relies on farming.

The process of divorce in Ifugao, however, is not as tedious as the one offered in the divorce bill prepared by our legislators.

Ngilit said the separation of a couple was processed through amicable settlements between the families of the concerned spouses. Community elders play a vital part in mediating these settlements.

After an agreement is reached, the couple divide their property and end the talks with the butchering of a cow or a pig to be shared with the community.

In Sagada, Mt. Province, a member of the Kankanaey tribe said the grounds for divorce varied from homicide, infertility and impotence, to insanity. The divorce process among Kankanaeys is called sina.

Parties involved in the separation butcher carabaos and pigs to formalize the settlement.

Childlessness

In a 1979 dissertation titled "The Social World of the Ibalays" by Ursula Cariño Perez, childlessness was cited as the "strongest ground for divorce." Incompatibility, laziness, cruelty and infidelity are seldom used as reasons for divorce in Ibalay communities.

Divorce among Ibalay couples is known as ed'dang. However, this type of separation is only temporary because Ibalays believe the couple can remarry.In other Ibalay communities, divorce is called bisak.The ed'dang can take effect for about a month or more depending on what has been agreed upon by the parties. In case of cruelty or infidelity, the ed'dang may be imposed for a certain period to allow the guilty party to reform.

If the spouses insist on having a divorce, the council of elders would give them a prescribed period, about a year or more, to consider their desire to separate.

If conflict between the spouses was not resolved within the prescribed period, the elders would then require them to submit themselves for final separation.

In the ritual, a pig, cow or carabao is butchered and community members are invited and notified of the divorce.

A couple granted divorce due to infertility divide their property equally and share in the expenses for the ritual performed.

A study conducted by Lyn Madalang, executive director of the gender rights group Ebgan, dealt with a case of separation and multiple marriages in Bauko, Mt. Province.

Madalang, a native of Bauko, said a part of the study dealt with the experiences of her grandmother, who was engaged in multiple marriages, and the cases of divorce in their town.

"I found out that multiple marriages in Bauko are born out of divorce cases. Divorce has been practiced by our forefathers and it (helped explain) why most members of the community are our close relatives," she said.

Community concern

Divorce, like marriage, in Bauko is considered a community concern.

The beauty of the traditional practice of marriage and divorce can be felt when the community is there to support the couples, according to Madalang.

"Either the former wife or husband treats the new wife or husband as his or her sibling," she said.

The Kankanaeys in Northern Benguet also treat divorce cases as community concerns.

When former Benguet board member Bial Palaez was born, the Kankanaeys in Kapangan town were so happy that the curse was broken after his parents underwent a divorce or man-ol-olang.

Palaez said divorce was actually allowed by a "cultural requirement."

"In my case, my parents had to undergo a man-ol-olang because my seven siblings who came before me were dying one after the other, so the elders decided that they have to separate to break the (curse)," Palaez said.

A ritual was performed after the Palaez couple decided to divorce. A ritual that involves the butchering of a pig was done to ask the spirits to assist the couple in mending their problems.

Months after, Palaez's parents remarried, but this time, they had to change to their names to signify their intention in establishing a new life and a new family and to forget the past.

"So when they married again, I came as the first born until there were seven of us. No one died anymore," Palaez said.

Only a few couples in northern Benguet still practice the man-ol-olang since Christianity and other religions have slowly been embraced in indigenous communities.

In Mt. Province, couples choose to undergo indigenous wedding ceremonies but still formalize their marriage vows in Catholic or Anglican churches.

"Colonial policies did not help in solving marriage problems. For me, the divorce bill being (proposed by Sen. Rodolfo Biazon) is just right since we have so many cases of separations. And we can never say that divorce can erode family values," Madalang said.

"Why is it that violence against women and incest rape are rampant if there are real family values?" she asked.

Baguio's deep, dark secrets

BY VINCENT CABREZA
Baguio City

BAGUIO City's prime real estate is perhaps its biggest asset. About 30 percent of properties in the city have commercial values that shoot up to as high as P500 million, making Baguio land one of the country's most coveted assets in recent history.

That quality of wealth had also been pressure enough to keep the city's deepest, darkest secrets buried for nearly 11 years. Until typhoon "Feria" showed up on July 4, battering its hillsides and unraveling its "very real" geological nightmares for all to see.

About 50 sinkholes, imperiled cliffside communities and countless home lots that are vulnerable to flooding were again uncovered as Feria's rains killed close to 40 people in a matter of days.

Most of these conditions had been documented and mapped out by the Mines and Geosciences Bureau (MGB) as far back as 10 years ago, following the city's devastation after the July 16, 1990 earthquake.

But the city government has only been reflecting on the geological hazards after Feria.

Vice Mayor Betty Lourdes Tabanda is bracing herself for a fresh round of legislative debates to push into law a comprehensive land-use plan that incorporates "very real public hazard zones" identified by the MGB five years ago.

It will be the land-use plan's second foray into the public eye. When the plan was first introduced in 1998, councilors agonized over the hazard zones' impact on real estate taxes, as well as the fundamental foundations of Baguio's landed wealth, Tabanda said.

"The hidden issue (behind) the city's resistance to hazard zones had been land values. There were fears (raised by other councilors) that the hazard zones will plunge Baguio's real estate values to a disastrous low. (A councilor) kept raising the hazard zones' impact on taxes because he said the zones could mean a scaling down of values," Tabanda said.

"While it is ideal to defend the land-use plan because it protects people from such hazards, the real concerns (raised by most city officials) were about (economics)."

True land scale

Neoman de la Cruz, MGB regional director, said the city's real estate concern could never replace the lives lost to Feria's landslides.

The buried houses in Barangays Irisan and Pinsao Proper were built on cliff sides.

"People did not really learn from the 1990 earthquake. But I am hoping they learned from Feria. It sometimes takes a tragedy to prick our conscience about what our priorities should have been," De la Cruz said.

"If real estate was the real issue why our geological hazard warnings had been ignored, why deceive our (real estate) buyers? Why didn't we tell our people that their lands lie atop danger spots? We should not use the principle of caveat emptor—buyers beware—because we are talking about lives here."

But real estate fears have not been flimsy concerns.

Fay Apil, the region's chief government geologist, said the hazard zones posted on environmental maps are drawn to include a wide margin of coverage because most of the actual danger spots have yet to be measured scientifically, according to their actual scale.

Several zones are located in high-end properties. For example, the mansions near Mines View Park, which the late strongman Ferdinand Marcos allegedly bought or built in the 1980s, are actually located on a fault line that geologists had already mapped out before July 1990.

Limestone base

Multimillion-peso houses also line Barangays Crystal Cave, Dominican Hill, Mirador Hill and Quezon Hill. All properties sit on limestone foundations.

Limestone areas are normally lined with surface and underground sinkholes because lime is chemically vulnerable to water. Such sinkholes act as water tunnels, delivering surface runoff water down to underground rivers or toward the lowlands.

Many are big enough to swallow houses.

The MGB documented the collapse of a house in Crystal Cave in 1997. Apil said the house was built right above a thin layer of limestone that barely shielded a sinkhole.

Typhoons that year caused the sinkhole layer to open, swallowing a foundation column of the Daag family home. The same sinkhole is endangering the household of neighbor Liza Mamail.

A real estate broker said industry experts felt that the hazard zones could trigger a 50-percent plunge in Baguio's land values.

"We are worried because the way we understand sinkholes and geological hazards, you are not allowed to develop these parcels of land anymore, and land is a vital commodity in such short supply in Baguio. The city realized our concerns because its need for investors relied on how valuable Baguio land really is," the broker admitted.

Gaps in land value

But even Baguio's land value scale may be temporary.

Estrella Tano, city assessor, said the gaps between the actual land values the city imposes and the commercial land values imposed by brokers have been too wide for comfort.

Tano cited Session Road in downtown Baguio and the Mines View Park properties.

"One Session Road property, for example, reportedly sells at P100,000 for every square meter when we actually value such land at P5,500," Tano explained.

"The Bureau of Internal Revenue also has a vastly divergent zonal valuation system, so the same property costs P20,000 per square meter to them. So Baguio land had been at the center of such (industry confusion)."

She said the proposed hazard zones might actually help rationalize the real estate industry and help stabilize land prices in the city.

"You don't lose any value if your land has problems like this. The city reduces your taxes and the land remains an asset. In fact, the city could actually offer better incentives for tree farms or parks if these parcels of land are not supposed to be inhabited. Trees can help secure the land, and the city can offer tax incentives for that," Tano said.

De la Cruz said Baguio homeowners and real estate brokers should take a second look at the geological sciences.

Monsters or angels

"I think the fears are misplaced because they are reacting more to monsters than angels. We did not propose a hazard map so we can eject people, we are offering the hazard map so people would know how to live there," he said.

He said houses on perilous sites must deal with their fate from "good engineering perspectives."

"If a house sits on top of a small sinkhole, it can extend its foundations beyond the sinkhole or seek new braces to avoid falling into them. Sinkholes are not made overnight. It takes millions, hundreds of years for one to develop, and water eats into lime for the same amount of time. So we are not dealing with new problems, unless you block the sinkholes," he said.

"Water will always look for a way down, and that will probably cause landslides instead. We are advocating mitigation measures because you cannot stop nature. You just have to live with it."

'Edsa 2' launching

THE BAGUIO launch of "Edsa 2 A Nation in Revolt," a photographic account of the events that led to People Power 2 in January this year, will be held at 4 p.m. on July 21 at Iggy's Inn and Restaurant on South Drive.

Some of the 53 leading Filipino photojournalists whose works are included in the 231-page journal will grace the launching.

The book, published by Anvil and AsiaPix, is not just a photographic account of the revolt against President Joseph Estrada but also a chronicle of the events that led to the downfall of the popularly elected president.

The photographs "unmask the real Estrada and reveal that the image he projected was different from what he really was: A President who took advantage of his popularity to rob the country blind," according to the book's back cover blurb.

the suspects as Tirath, Harmil, Joseph and Kulwant Singh.

Judge Ma. Angelica Paras-Quimbao of the municipal trial court in Magalang and Mabalacat towns in Pampanga issued the warrants for their arrest.

Immigration Commissioner Andrea Domingo also ordered the arrest of Baljit and Parmait Kaur, the wives of Tarith and Harmil, respectively, who had allegedly entered the Philippines using spurious papers.

Starting in February

The four Indians were linked to the abduction of Sukwinder Singh, Balwant Singh, Paul Singh Nahal and Asha Rani.

They were also allegedly involved in about 20 other unreported kidnapping cases in Central Luzon's Indian community of more than 2,000 nationals.

According to reports gathered by the NBI from Indian communities, the victims were abducted starting in February in Mexico and Magalang towns in Pampanga; Gerona town in Tarlac; and San Jose City in Nueva Ecija.

The families of the victims—except for Rani, a 30-year-old businesswoman who was believed raped and killed—reportedly paid ransom of at least P1.8 million each. Rani has been missing since Feb. 11.

The kidnappers, reportedly aided by Filipinos, held the victims for an average of 30 days, releasing them only when the ransom had been paid in full.

Orlando Dizon, NBI regional director, said the crackdown on the Indian kidnappers of fellow Indians would not have been possible if the victims' relatives did not provide leads to authorities.

Dizon said the NBI had been investigating kidnapping incidents since 1998 but could not come close because of the silence of the victims' relatives.

NBI sources said the syndicate, believed led by one Jaswinder Pal, had "outgrown" its robbery and extortion activities in the early 1980s.

It now reportedly operates in Bataan, Bulacan, Nueva Ecija, Pampanga, Tarlac and Zambales under the supervision of provincial handlers with connections to the police and military.

Most of the abductors are new arrivals from India who operate in tandem with longtime legal immigrants, the sources said.

They said local Indian business groups had not raised an alarm. It is the communities of Indians into small retail and lending businesses who are doing so.

"We are urging the victims and their families to come out in the open to identify the kidnappers. We need your participation to pursue the crackdown," Dizon said.

Corrupt cops

Tiglaio said the President had also ordered Mendoza to bear down on corrupt cops.

He quoted Mendoza as saying that the PNP would deploy some 2,000 new recruits from the provinces to replace the corrupt traffic cops who collect protection money from drivers.

"Mendoza said one of their solutions is to get new trainees from the provinces to replace the beat cops in Metro Manila. These are the new graduates who are still idealistic..." Tiglaio said.

"The only problem with them is that most of them don't even know where (SM) Megamall (on EDSA) is. They are very well trained, very well motivated, and they will be properly familiarized with Metro Manila where 30 percent of crimes happen."

Tiglaio said these idealistic new policemen would wear a different uniform to distinguish them from the station cops and would also report to a central command.

At the Cabinet meeting, Mendoza gave a 10-minute situationer on peace and order.

He said the total crime volume, dropped by 14 percent in the first six months of this year, compared to the same period last year.

He also said total index crimes, or crimes against persons and property, decreased by 12 percent from 19,518 to 17,348.

Non-index crimes involving violation of special laws decreased by 12 percent.

Tiglaio said the PNP was in dire need of equipment because 90 percent of its yearly budget was going to the salaries of its 110,000 uniformed and non-uniformed personnel.

"Even some of their police cars aren't that well maintained," he said.

Tiglaio said the PNP needed P1.5 billion to buy surveillance and other equipment.

He said Budget Secretary Emilia Boncodin and other Cabinet members had promised to find the needed amount.

porters of Estrada, who is now detained on charges of plunder and perjury.

The sources said PMLP was identified with Noli de la Cruz and Arturo Tabara, who broke away from the Communist Party of the Philippines in the early 1990s.

On Dec. 26, 1999, Tabara, the alleged chair of the Rebolusyonaryong Partido ng Manggagawa ng Pilipinas (RPMP), and De la Cruz, the alleged vice chair of RPMP, met with then President Estrada in Baguio City. They announced the holding of peace talks between RPMP and the government.

The RPMP's armed wing is said to be the Revolutionary Proletarian Army-Alex Boncayao Brigade (RPP-ABB).

The Sosyalistang Kilusang Manggagawa (SKM), however, said that Singh and Marcelo were not ABB leaders but trade union organizers of SKM.

"We deny that they are ABB leaders," SKM vice president Roel Garcia told the INQUIRER last night.

Garcia said Singh and Marcelo were arrested on Commonwealth Avenue while holding a meeting with SKM members.

He said SKM was a legal organization of workers, peasants and urban poor chaired by lawyer Ernesto Arellano, head of the National Federation of Labor.

Political dissenters

"Despite EDSA I and EDSA II demands for meaningful social transformation, the military-police establishment continues to resort to practices blatantly disregarding human rights by simply labeling political dissenters as members of the communist movement," SKM said in a statement.

Garcia said the military planted the guns and the grenade allegedly seized from the two trade union organizers.

De los Santos said a joint military and police team confiscated from Singh and Marcelo two .45 cal. pistols and a fragmentation grenade.

The Army chief said the two were also in possession of documents supposedly detailing plans to disrupt Ms Macapagal's Sona. De los Santos did not disclose what these plans were.

But Army spokesperson Lt. Col. Jose Mabanta said the documents indicated "no violent plans." "All of these are protests and marches."

Mabanta said the civil disturbance plan included a march by leftist groups on Congress, where they would protest against government's policies.

Militant groups are planning to launch rallies on Monday to highlight what they call Ms Macapagal's "failure to live up to the expectations of People Power II."

Garcia said SKM was planning to stage rallies on Monday.

The rallies are aimed at exposing Ms Macapagal as a President not serving the interests of the poor. "During her first six months in office, she did not keep her promise to fight poverty, adopt new policies and push for good governance," Garcia said.

Director Thompson Lantion, community relations chief of the Philippine National Police (PNP), said security preparations for the President's first Sona would be further tightened in light of the arrest.

Lantion said the PNP would field 1,000 additional personnel, raising to at least 3,000 the number of police personnel to be deployed at the Batasang Pambansa where Ms Macapagal will deliver her Sona.

Singh and Marcelo are reportedly wanted for the "liquidation" of four people.

De los Santos said the two were responsible for the killing of Angelo de la Cruz, general manager of Kawasaki Philippines in November 2000, and Remedio Pascua, a resident of Bulacan, on Oct. 12, 2000.

Singh and Marcelo also reportedly had a hand in the killing of Gregorio Yaber, president of the Katipunan ng mga Kooperatibang Pangsakayan ng Pilipinas, on Sept. 14, 2000 and Enrique Alden, president of the Ugnayan ng Maralit sa Letre in Malabon, on Nov. 27, 1999.

"We expect a slowdown in liquidations as a result of their arrest," De los Santos said.

Mabanta said investigators were determining whether Singh and Marcelo were behind the assassination of labor leader Filemon "Popoy" Lagman inside the University of the Philippines campus in Quezon City last February.

Lagman was the head of the ABB until a faction led by De la Cruz broke away from the group.

"You know Nilo de la Cruz has been quiet for sometime. But the top henchman of the ABB certainly continues to have ties with the members," Mabanta said.

Lagman's group itself was a breakaway faction of the Communist Party of the Philippines, which suffered splits due to ideological differences in the early 1990s.

Mabanta said the ABB's membership had dwindled to only about 200 active members due to military successes.

The ABB and its allied organizations had earlier entered into a peace agreement with the Estrada administration. With a report from AP proposal during his Sona because the economy was then in good shape.

"But this is the first budget of President Gloria Macapagal-Arroyo anyway so we would like to make sure that it's realistic. That is why we cannot disclose now how much budget we will be asking for because there will still be a Cabinet meeting after the Sona," she said.

In the proposed budget, the Macapagal administration must assume a specific peso-dollar exchange for next year. It must also set the targets for revenue collection, budget deficit and economic growth rate.

The steep depreciation of the peso against the dollar the past few days and poor revenue collections amid the global economic slowdown make the setting of the national budget for 2002 difficult.

For this year, the administration adopted last year's budget of P629 billion as Congress failed to pass the proposed general appropriations act for 2000 because it was preoccupied with the impeachment of former President Joseph Estrada.

The Macapagal administration later asked Congress to pass a P10.9-billion supplemental budget.

Presidential spokesperson Rigoberto Tiglaio said the President was concerned about the fall of the peso to its lowest since she assumed the presidency.

Tiglaio attributed the peso's fall to the pronouncement of Argentina that it would drastically cut government spending.

He said fund managers not just in Asia but the rest of the world responded to Argentina's announcement by bringing their dollars back to the United States.

Boncodin disclosed that the government posted a less-than-expected budget deficit of around P76 billion in the first six months.

"On a preliminary basis, figures show we are P4 billion below (the target)," Boncodin told Reuters.

The target for the period has been fixed at P80 billion.

Financial analysts closely watch the government's budget deficit. They have said the mounting deficit is a major negative factor for the economy.

In an earlier statement, Boncodin said weaker tax revenue in the first half of the year had been partly offset by improved collections from Customs and Treasury operations as well as unexpected privatization proceeds.

She reiterated that the government was sticking to its P145-billion budget deficit target for the full year despite newspaper reports suggesting it planned to hike the figure to around P180 billion because of the sluggish economy.

"As of May this year, collections from fees and charges (by Customs) have exceeded by P1.2 billion the P9-billion projection," she said in the statement.

Collections by the Bureau of Treasury exceeded the targeted amount by P4 billion while P489 million in privatization proceeds were received in the first five months which had not been programmed for.

The statement said efforts were ongoing to keep expenditure within programmed levels.

Tax revenues have come under pressure from the country's economic slowdown, prompting the inter-agency Development Budget Coordinating Council to scale down the income target of the Bureau of Internal Revenue for this year by P20 billion.

The revised total revenue target for 2001 is now set at P558.2 billion, the council said in a statement on Monday.

In the first five months of the year, the deficit reached P58.326 billion, up sharply from P28.079 billion in April but lower than the programmed figure of P61.8 billion for the period.

Boncodin said final deficit figures for the first six months would be released by next week. Reports from Juliet L. Javellana and Reuters dissension in the Senate when she admitted last week that she supported the candidacy of Sen. Franklin Drilon though "not in public."

Another fight

Another bitter fight is brewing in the Senate over who will chair the finance committee, the most powerful panel in the Upper Chamber.

The issue has further snagged talks among Drilon and his rivals for the Senate leadership. Senators Renato Cayetano and Joker Arroyo. The other contender is the incumbent Senate president, Aquilino Pimentel Jr.

Drilon reportedly supports the present finance committee chair, Sen. John Osmeña; Cayetano backs Sen. Sergio Osmeña III; and Arroyo is all-out for Sen. Manuel Villar.

An administration senator is raising hell over Drilon's choice of Osmeña, an independent senator who used to be identified with the opposition and former President Joseph Estrada.

"We don't want to play footsie with the enemy," the senator told the INQUIRER.

He admitted that it is not the failed power sharing agreement that is dividing the PPC contenders for the Senate's top post but the chairmanship of the finance committee.

"Our problem with Drilon is this: We cannot understand why Drilon is driving hard to give John Osmeña the finance chairmanship, considering he's not with the PPC," the senator told the INQUIRER.

"Why give the most powerful committee in the Senate to a non-PPC?" he asked, adding that Osmeña "is going to give you a headache."

Sen. Juan Flavio, who is acting as "honest broker" in the talks, admitted that the chairmanship of the finance committee has become a sore point, but denied that Drilon wants to give it to Osmeña.

"It was never discussed in my presence, it was never discussed in any of the meetings we had. Nothing," he said in a news briefing.

The INQUIRER tried to reach Drilon, but he was not available for comment. He did not return the INQUIRER's call.

'Killing' each other

Flavio admitted that the fight between Sergio Osmeña and Villar is heating up. Villar wants the post on the basis of the fact that he was once a Speaker of the House, the fourth highest official of the land.

"I've heard the two have already killed each other over the matter," Flavio typically tried to make light of the ongoing struggle when asked how intense was the fight over the finance chair who oversees the budget allocation to government agencies, including pork barrel for senators and congressmen.

But Flavio did not discount the possibility that John Osmeña could also be working to reclaim his post, since he is now an independent senator.

"That's the third angle of the triangle," he said of John Osmeña.

The INQUIRER source said Drilon was backing John Osmeña so that he can draw support from the opposition should he fail to get support from the PPC.

The source said this is totally unacceptable to the administration party, which he claims already has about 14 votes to elect a president.

Besides, he said the opposition occupying key committees in the Senate will spell trouble for the Palace.

"Can Malacañang or we in the PPC allow a situation that, maybe (Panfilo Lacson) becomes chair of the peace and order committee?" the source appeared incredulous.

"Can you have a situation where the majority members of the Commission on Appointments is with (Sen. Edgardo) Angara's faction? Malacañang is dead meat, what happens to (Justice) Hernandez Perez? President Macapagal's Cabinet will be sitting ducks," he said.

Angara is the opposition's lone candidate for Senate president.

He said the opposition can't wait to support Drilon to "get back into power."

On the matter of power-sharing, Flavio said Drilon has agreed to the idea and is still discussing details with Cayetano.

He said Cayetano is willing to cut his term to only one year if he is allowed to serve first. Cayetano wants to use the two remaining years to prepare for his reelection bid.

Administration senators were scheduled to have at least three more meetings yesterday evening to resolve the issues that continue to divide them.

Abad in a corner

In the Lower House, Abad, the only serious rival of De Venecia for the speakership may have painted himself into a corner after nixing a power-sharing agreement as chair of the House committee on appropriations.

From the commanding heights of the speakership, Abad may find himself stuck with being a mere co-chair of one of the House's most powerful committees.

Abad had remained adamant about a "15-15" agreement that had been set up by PPC leaders in the House.

Under the agreement, Abad would have assumed chairmanship of the powerful committee on appropriations while Palawan Rep. Vicente Sandoval would lead the House contingent to the Commission on Appointments for 15 months.

After 15 months, Abad and Sandoval would exchange posts.

"But Congressman Abad wanted the chairmanship of the committee on appropriations to be permanent," said a Lakas source.

Dismayed by Abad's reaction, Lakas withdrew its compromise offer and downgraded its proposal to co-chairmanship of the committee on appropriations vice Camarines Sur Rep. Rolando Andaya Jr.

Abad had lost his chance to lead the House delegation to the CA. Sandoval had already agreed to assume the post in exchange for his withdrawal from the speakership race.

As of late Monday night, Abad was reportedly meeting with members of the Liberal Party to discuss the proposal to co-chair the committee on appropriations.

Should Abad still refuse to accept the offer, he may be left with no choice but to carry on with his fight to foil De Venecia's comeback bid to lead the House.

The election for Speaker will be held 10 a.m. July 23, just hours before President Macapagal delivers her State of the Nation Address at the Batasan Pambansa.

Minority floor leader

In the event he loses the race, Abad would have to assume the post of minority floor leader, and ironically find himself allied with congressmen with close ties to deposed President Estrada.

"(Abad) would definitely not want to be identified as pro-Erap," said the Lakas official.

After the election for Speaker, also to be voted upon will be the Deputy Speakers for Luzon, Visayas and Mindanao.

As of yesterday, it was most likely that Masbate Rep. Emilio Espinosa and Iloilo Rep. Raul Gonzales would be named deputy speaker for Luzon and the Visayas, respectively.

Peso falls to 53.95 against the US dollar dollars on the spot market would continue pressuring the peso in the coming days.

Victor Valdepeñas, president of Union Bank of the Philippines, urged the BSP to intervene and stem the peso's plunge.

"What you need now is a body that has the bullet, the ammunition, the tools to be able to cool down the market and that would be the central bank," Valdepeñas told local television.

Not yet

But Buenaventura pointed out that the peso was not totally out of line with depreciating currencies in the region.

"Not yet," he said when asked about possible BSP intervention. "If it is speculative, we will not hesitate to come in."

Asked by reporters whether the BSP would adjust overnight rates to help the peso, Buenaventura said: "No, because this is not driven by interest rates but purely market forces. We're not totally out of line with other currencies."

The overnight borrowing rate is now at 9.0 percent and the lending rate is 11.25 percent.

Buenaventura attributed the peso's current weakness to the imbalance of demand and supply—a temporary condition, according to him, until more dollar flows come in. He did not say where the liquidity was likely to come from.

Asked if the Philippines would consider using a recent currency swap agreement with Japan to defend its currency, the BSP governor said: "We still have $14.5 billion gross international reserves. We don't really need it. What we're trying to avoid is to set a rate that is not supply-demand driven."

Manila and Tokyo reached a basic-agreement last week to set up a dollar-peso swap facility, expected to be around $3.0 billion, as part of an Asia-wide currency safety net to fend off future financial crises.

Futile

Analysts agreed it would be futile for the central bank to try to arrest the peso's decline given the limited weapons at its disposal.

Smoking . . .

sumption is not a drain on the budget of the Czech Republic partly because the early death of smokers helped offset medical expenses.

The report, which was released in the Czech Republic several weeks ago, sparked a new burst of outrage from anti-tobacco groups. One group called it "callous."

The US-based Campaign for Tobacco-Free Kids said the report showed the tobacco company's disregard for public health.

"Would a responsible, reformed tobacco company tell foreign governments that dead smokers are a good thing for their budgets?" asked campaign president Matthew Myers.

"The same Philip Morris that has spent millions of dollars on a public relations campaign to convince the American public that it is now a responsible company, is also telling the government of the Czech Republic that smoking is good for the government's finances because of savings from early deaths caused by smoking."

"Philip Morris' cost-benefit analysis of the consequences of smoking represents not only bad economics, but also a callous disregard for life," Myers said.

The report, commissioned by Philip Morris and produced by a consulting firm, said the premature demise of smokers saved the Czech government between $23.8 million and $30.1 million on health care, pensions and housing for the elderly in 1999.

Even after the cost of caring for sick smokers and people made ill by second-hand smoke, the report concluded that in 1999 the government had a net gain of $147.1 million from smoking.

'Shocking' report

Philip Morris, after confirming the existence of the report, which was earlier published in the Wall Street Journal and The Prague Post, was quick to say that the company was not seeking to debate the effects of smoking.

"It is absolutely not the intention of Philip Morris to try to put smoking in a positive light" for individuals or governments, said Remi Calvet, a spokesperson for Philip Morris in Europe.

Calvet acknowledged that the way the report was released "could appear rather shocking."

He said the company commissioned the report to gather economic data in the debate over how much health care for smokers costs the country.

"There's actually no intention by Philip Morris to enter the debate on tobacco and health," he said.

In a statement issued on Monday, Philip Morris International said it "deeply regrets any impression from this study that the premature death of smokers represents a ben-

They said the country could also derive some advantages from a weaker currency. The peso has now lost almost 6 percent of its value this year.

"I don't think they (BSP officials) should be considering either option . . . With intervention, you'll end up throwing money into the market and it will say thank you very much. A tighter interest rates environment is also not good in a weakening economy," said Andrew Fung, Rabobank Singapore head of research for Asia/Pacific.

Keon Lee, JP Morgan deputy head of Asian economics, shared Buenaventura's view that an interest rate hike was not the way to go.

"Buenaventura learned back in October 2000 that raising interest rates by 400 basis points does not do anything to the exchange rate if the underlying reason is political," the Hong Kong-based Lee said.

The BSP raised rates by 4 percent last October to try to defend the peso that was reeling from the "Juettengate" scandal involving then President Joseph Estrada.

Fung said a weaker peso would still bring some benefits to the economy.

Export earnings would be bolstered, the central bank would preserve precious international reserves and letting the peso track the weakening economy would avoid the danger of misalignment with regional currencies.

But the cost of imports, such as oil and electronic components, would rise. A weaker currency would also push prices of imported goods and raise the cost of servicing foreign loans.

Bleak outlook

According to Fung, the peso's overall direction will be determined by the yen, which has dropped more than 8 percent this year.

He said his bank saw the peso falling to 55 per dollar by the end of the year.

Barclay's Capital in Singapore painted a more bearish outlook, saying in a recent strategy report that the peso could fall to around 60 to the dollar in a year's time.

The slump in electronics exports, which makes up to 60 percent of exports, was unlikely to improve. Foreign investment also looked grim given the law and order problems and Southeast Asia's attractiveness as an investment destination, the weekly report said.

In addition, foreign remittances were unlikely to improve due to the economic slowdown in Asia and the Middle East, the main destinations for Filipino migrant workers.

BAP to cooperate

Buenaventura said the Bankers Association of the Philippines had agreed to take steps to arrest speculation against the peso.

"They (BAP officers) promised to take the necessary steps, and we took it in good faith," Buenaventura said. He did not elaborate on the measures the banks will implement.

The central bank is currently investigating 10 banks for allegedly violating currency trading rules.

BAP president Placido Mapa said the central bank met with the BAP on Monday and expressed concern that the industry practice known as churning was exacerbating pressure on the local currency.

Churning involves banks buying and selling dollars to each other purely for capital gain without any underlying trade-related purpose, such as buying the US currency to pay for imports.

Mapa said the heads of banks "indicated a willingness to cooperate" when asked by Buenaventura to curb the practice.

He said the proposed anti-money laundering bill was also discussed.

Mapa said the BAP was supportive of the bill as long as it preserved "the existing protection of depositors regarding their concerns that the lifting of secrecy might expose them to kidnappers and to abusive BIR agents."

The Philippines, along with Russia and the Pacific Island of Nauru, has been given an ultimatum to take concrete steps by Sept. 30 to combat money laundering or face sanctions.

The Paris-based Financial Action Task Force has singled out the three countries from a longer blacklist of "uncooperative jurisdictions" on the issue.

Hedge facility

For his part, Buenaventura said the BSP was considering expanding a dollar-hedging program to ease pressure on the peso.

The central bank's hedging facility, or currency rate risk protection program, is designed to provide non-deliverable forward cover to local businesses that are concerned about a decline in the exchange rate.

Buenaventura said the program might be expanded to include new investments and debt up to five years in maturity, following a proposal from local banks.

At present the scheme's maximum coverage period is only 180 days.

"We have not made up our mind but we are still studying the proposal. It's worth pursuing," Buenaventura said.

"What we are trying to avoid is a temporary imbalance where people are not bringing in funds (dollars into the market)," he said.

Asians cut back on frills, opt for value-for-money deals

ASIANS are continuing to buy expensive items such as houses and cars despite the economic downturn, but are cutting back on fitness classes, according to a regional survey.

The Straits Times Asia poll on spending patterns showed that designer clothes and dining out were also off the menu as consumers were opting for long-term investments and value-for-money deals.

"I have actually sold more houses this year than in the past two years," said Yanti Handayani, who works for an Indonesian real estate company.

But the survey of middle-class consumers in 11 Asian economies found 44 percent of the respondents knew someone who had lost his job because of the downturn, and 52 percent were bracing for the economic climate to worsen.

"Anything that can be saved, we try to save," said Randy Cheng, 37, the director of operations at a Singapore travel agency.

"If I can have a 3-dollar meal, why should I have a 5-dollar one," Cheng said.

But the mood is not all pessimism with close to 16 percent expecting their earnings to increase this year. 38 percent said their income would stay the same despite profit warnings and job cutbacks.

"The economic downturn is a temporary thing. It will pass," said Zhong Ming, a 27-year-old consultant in China.

The most optimistic views on earnings emerged from the Philippines and Japan. South Koreans and Singaporeans believed their income would go down.

As to the cause of the downturn, 34 percent blamed their own government compared to 29 percent who recognized the cause in external factors such as the US economic slowdown.

Whatever the cause, 62 percent said they were now more discriminating in their personal spending in areas such as fitness classes and buying cosmetics, while 45 percent were more inclined to buy non-brandname goods.

Almost 50 percent are eating at less expensive restaurants and 35 percent have postponed a holiday.

But when questioned about spending money on a house or car, 43 percent said their plan had not been put off by the downturn, compared to 38 percent who said they had.

The poll was conducted in the Philippines, China, Japan, South Korea, Singapore, Malaysia, India, Indonesia, Thailand, Taiwan and Hong Kong. AFP

Congress help needed

WHEN the 12th Congress opens on Monday, July 23, members of both Houses particularly sports-minded Reps. Jaime Lopez and Monico Puentevella, a former commissioner of the Philippine Sports Commission, and Sens. Robert Jaworski and Vicente Sotto III, who are both former national players, should note the plight of the differently abled athletes.

I appeal to them, for the sake of equity and fairness, to file a bill that should reward the medal winners of the Paralympic Games similar to House Bill 12029 which was recently signed into law by President Macapagal-Arroyo granting cash and other incentives to Olympic and Asian Games medalists. These differently abled athletes train and prepare for international tournaments just as hard and serious as normal athletes in their quest for glory.

Although the Paralympic Games lack the breathless media coverage of the Olympics proper, these gritty athletes with a disability deserve a better treatment from all sectors, including the government, because the Paralympic athletes are the true Olympians. As the name implies, the Paralympic Games are parallel to the Olympic Games. Held immediately after the Olympics proper, the meet is supervised by the International Paralympic Committee, a counterpart to the International Olympic Committee.

"Avid followers of the Paralympic Games will find themselves marveling—as they would at the Olympics proper—at the Paralympians' grit and exceptional ability to push the envelope of human performance," said a supporter of the Paralympics. "I've gone to many of these competitions, and I've found again and again that very quickly the spectators start to see the athletes for the sportsmen they truly are. The focus on the disability goes away very quickly."

LEONARDO Andam, Efrén "Bata" Reyes and three other Filipinos moved into strong contention yesterday in making the round of 64 of the 2001 Admiral World Pool Championships in Cardiff, Wales.

Ballesteros Maxi champ

DEFENDING champion Geoffrey Ballesteros of Castrol survived a gutsy stand by Randy Ortiz of R.C. Car Exchange and Ricky Montellano of 221-Elf Racing to rule the third round of the Maxi Scooter Series at the Batangas Racing Circuit in Rosario, Batangas recently.

Ballesteros, who bagged the title with a dramatic victory over Carlo Yalo of Exact last year, held off both Ortiz and Montellano in the one-day event sponsored by Elf Lubricants, Castrol, Silkolene, Red Bull, Liana's Supermarket, 221-Elf Cycle Works, Pirelli Exact and Malossi.

Equally impressive was last year's winner Robby Inigo of 221-Elf Works, who ruled the geared class over perennial rivals Alfie Lim of Castrol-Period Racing and Dennis Banez of Elf-221.

Inigo won over Lim and Banez, who enjoyed 1-2 positions in the overall standings.

Osaka CEO sports chair

OSAKA Iridology CEO and sportsman Jonathan Guardo was named new chair of the Cebu City Sports Commission.

Guardo's appointment was announced by Cebu City Councilor Jack Jakosalem along with four others—businessman-athlete Jay Aldeguer, Freeman sports editor Nimrod Quinoñes, Fort president Roly Jonico and fitness guru Calixto Pacquiao—who were also tapped as commissioners.

"These people are equally qualified and have committed their lives to sports," said Jakosalem. "We want people who have the time and also the desire to do the job."

Guardo said he was honored and grateful to Jakosalem and Cebu City Mayor Tommy Osmeña for their confidence in him and "for giving me this opportunity to serve."

CEBU CITY—Chariot Metro Cab Skyygo and M. Lhuillier prevailed over separate rivals yesterday to start their title bids on a positive note in the Cebu Basketball League Commissioner's Cup at the New Cebu Coliseum.

The Chariot Sykgoers needed an extra period to squeeze out a hard earned 81-79 thriller over a revitalized Osaka Iridology while the Jewelers, beefed up by former Shell import Bobby Parks, banked on experience to turn back ML Kwarto Padala.

Reggie Licanda and defense specialist Gary Cortes took charge with 15 points apiece while Bernie Ural added 13 as Chariot uncorked a decisive 8-1 run in overtime and leaned on its experience to repulse a late-game uprising by Osaka, now under the helm of new head coach Elmer "Boy" Cabahug.

21 Filipinos start action in World Junior Golf

SAN DIEGO, California—The Philippines, represented by 21 teenagers, will start its campaign in the 34th Junior World Golf championship today on eight courses here.

The last time a Filipino won here was Dorothy Joy Delasin in the girls 15-17 years in her final appearance in 1998. Among the other previous winners include Carito Villaroman, Ramon Brobio, Carmelette Villaroman and Cosco Oben.

Former national champion Artemio Murakami plays in the boys 15-17 in his final stint against 236 of the world's best.

There are a total of 1,056 players entered in five age divisions.

"We have assembled the most prepared contingent and we look forward to some positive results," said Amalia Montecillo, chair of the Junior Golf Foundation of the Philippines.

Jayvee Agojo and Tonitis Asistio are favored to win in their divisions after they won last week in the Temacula International.

Like Murakami, Agojo and Asistio are the standouts of a 10-leg summer tour.

Rizal Techno U advances to football finals

RIZAL Technological University proved unbeatable, whipping five teams, to advance to the Aug. 25 finals of the inaugural Lipovitan 4 on 4 soccer campus tour recently at the Don Bosco Technical College Gym in Mandaluyong City.

Bannered by Antonio Jason, Earl Don Torres, Charlie Aquino, Aldrin de los Angeles and Jay Roa, the RTU kickers downed their counterparts from Don Bosco, Jose Rizal University, Savio Youth Center, Alumni of Don Bosco and Industrial Technician Center in succession before an enthusiastic crowd. RTU is being coached by Pat Macalino.

Organized by Pro-Aide, Inc with Dexter M. Araquel as project director, the tournament is co-sponsored by Mizuno, Magic 89.9, Excel Press, Powerplant Rockwell Center. The national finals will be held at the Rockwell Center.

Aside from the Don Bosco elims, games will also be held at UP-Diliman, UST, College of St. Benilde, Southridge, UP Los Baños, Don Bosco Technical Institute-Tarlac.

The next qualifier will be held on July 20 at the Don Bosco Technical Institute at Makati City. Competing in the girls division are Assumption College, Colegio San Agustin and Savio Youth Center, while the boys' side features host Don Bosco Technical Institute, Colegio de San Agustin and Tuloy sa Don Bosco.

Araquel said the 4 on 4 is fast-paced and full of thrills. Among the salient points in its rules are: 1) there is no offside, 2) games are 10 minutes each played in two 5-minute halves, 3) referee throws the ball into play to start the game and after each goal, goalkeepers may not score goals aside from not handling the ball with their hands from a backpass. Goalies mustn't also leave the penalty area, no corners and all free kicks are indirect.

No doubt, Thailand is again our main rival for supremacy," said Lopez.

Lopez also bared a tentative list composed of 11 regulars and 6 alternates for the national team. Like Thailand, the Philippines will see action in the lightest (pinweight) and the heaviest class (light-heavyweight) in Kuala Lumpur.

Surprisingly, however, Sydney Olympian Danny Lerio didn't make it to the list. Lopez explained that Lerio, a light-flyweight, got affected by personal problems and failed to hurdle the tough qualifiers set by Abop.

Lopez: We'll win back boxing glory in SEAG

BY DENNIS U. EROA

MANNY Lopez, president of the Amateur Boxing Association of the Philippines, yesterday said the nationals are going to make a determined bid to win the overall trophy in the Kuala Lumpur 21st Southeast Asian Games in September.

"We worked tirelessly despite the dire economic situation because we're keen in recapturing the overall title in Malaysia," Lopez told the weekly PSA Sports Forum sponsored by Agfa Color and Red Bull at the Holiday Inn.

The Philippines lorded it over the ring in the 1991 and 1993 SEAG in Manila and Singapore, respectively, before getting overshadowed by the mighty Thais in the 1995, 1997 and 1999 editions of the biennial Games.

But Lopez is confident that the Filipino boxers, toughened by a no-nonsense buildup which took them to seven prestigious international tournaments, will give the world-class Thais a run for their money in the Malaysian capital. "The boys are in good condition. We need to play our cards right and do our best to unseat the Thais.

No doubt, Thailand is again our main rival for supremacy," said Lopez.

Lopez also bared a tentative list composed of 11 regulars and 6 alternates for the national team. Like Thailand, the Philippines will see action in the lightest (pinweight) and the heaviest class (light-heavyweight) in Kuala Lumpur.

Surprisingly, however, Sydney Olympian Danny Lerio didn't make it to the list. Lopez explained that Lerio, a light-flyweight, got affected by personal problems and failed to hurdle the tough qualifiers set by Abop.

Silverio cops both races of Asian Formula

JOJO Silverio of Standard Insurance-KACE Electronics-Team Tom's dominated both races of the 3rd leg of the six-leg Philippine Asian Formula 3 Challenge (F3) during the Casino Filipino Grand Prix recently at the Batangas Racing Circuit.

Silverio said: "It's a good win! I got a big overall lead. I'm now comfortable with my car, thanks to my team. I'm sure I can still improve a lot having sized up my competitors."

Silverio's best 16-lap time in the 2.873 km BRC track is 23.45.385; the fastest lap time was 1:13.674 in race 5. Teammates JP Tuason and Roland Hermoso of the Standard Insurance-KACE-Toyota Alabang team supported by Petron finished first and second, respectively, in Race 5 of the Formula Toyota Cup (FT). Hermoso dominated both races of the first leg in April.

Tuason said the sixth race was his best race ever—trading the lead many times with Enzo Pastor who edged Tuason 1.12 seconds, finishing 44.164 seconds behind Silverio's 20:45.302 total time in the re-started 14-lap combined F3-FT race. Kirk Arambulo trailed third in both rounds.

Philip Alvendia won second in both AF3 races. International racing veteran Mark Goddard Pepon Marave split third place in races 5 and 6, respectively. Marave actually finished second behind Silverio in race 5 but was "DQ" when his car weighed underweight.

Dream Fight: Pacquiao vs Espinosa

OK, a joke.

I guess not.

A couple of readers wrote to say they want Manny Pacquiao, the recently crowned world super bantamweight champion, to fight Luisito Espinosa, the former two-time world champion (bantamweight and featherweight).

"Let's make it a non-title fight," said the first reader. "Remember, Pacquiao used to be a flyweight. Now he is a bantam. I believe he'll go on growing, and accumulating those poundage. I will not be surprised if he'd soon gun for the featherweight crown."

"Since Espinosa is on the comeback trail," said the second reader, "one way to test him would be to pit him against Pacquiao. Forget about their weight. It's a non-title fight, anyway."

SPECTATOR

Al S.
Mendoza

One of proponents of the "Dream Fight" is T.M. Reynoso of the LWUA Public Affairs Department.

What do you think, fellas?

If you ask me, I think the idea is sound. I want to see it happen, actually. Bebot Elorde should give it a serious thought. He could hit a blockbuster card with this one. Complete with a TV coverage. With Jimmy Lennon as the ring announcer, yet.

How about Rudy Salud, the manager of Gerry Peñalosa? What does he think?

Well, the good lawyer may try to work something out of this. Good for Philippine boxing, don't you think so, Pareng Mama? I've always known you to be always championing the cause of Philippine boxing. This one deserves your attention, Pare.

Both fighters will look pogi should they agree to fight since an encounter would mean they'd be doing it more for the Filipino than boxing. A good idea would be to stage it as a benefit fight. Meaning, it'd be a non-profit venture. The proceeds could go to the victims of the Mayon Volcano eruption—a la Gerard Cantada. Or, if you want some international impact, donate the gate earnings to the ransom demand of the Abu Sayyaf gang if only to lampoon the rapaciousness of the conscienceless Abus.

I'm sure Espinosa, now training hard in San Francisco under the wings of Noel Rivera, will agree to the fight. He's raring to climb the ring again. And, against Pacquiao, it's going to be a big break in his comeback bid.

But Pacquiao?

He'll think twice, I know. But, if I were Pacquiao, I'll say yes. This is one time when he can show, in all sincerity, his oneness with the nation. For, this is not just a fight. This is also a test—of one's patriotic fervor, if not character. This is not a joke, fellas.

Will the promoter with a heart for charity please step forward then?

It will be easy from there.

Navy grabs Utilco lead

NAVY blanked Kaya, 3-0, to assume solo leadership in the 1st Army-Utilco International invitational football tournament last Sunday at the Ascom field in Fort Bonifacio.

Marion Pinerio, Jimmy Dona and Randy Jalbuena struck in the 23rd, 41st and 83rd minutes, respectively, to power the Navy men to their second straight win in the tourney organized by Army, sponsored by Utilco International Trading Corp. and sanctioned by the Philippine Football Federation.

Favored Army and Air Force also hurdled their respective rivals to share second place at 1-1, while San Beda shut-out PCU Taft, 3-0, in the other games.

The Army men blasted PCU Dasmariñas, 8-0, while the Airman crushed College of St. Benilde, 6-0. Tournament officials Saied Nikpassand, Capt. Ferdinand Espejo Jr. and M/Sgt. Jesus Baron Jr., who graced yesterday's PSA Forum, bared that Utilco president Butch Webber sponsored the tourney "as a sign of gratitude to the sport, being a former football player himself."

Montoya, Asuela top Shell chess

BACOLOD—Local defending champions Edsel Montoya and Eilan Asuela took the top slots in their respective brackets in the Western Visayas leg of the 2001 Shell National Youth Active Chess Championships.

The seven-round Swiss format tournament is co-sponsored by PLDT, Solid Shipping Lines Corp. and the Shell-Ciubank Mastercard.

Top seed Montoya, a 17-year-old high school senior from La Carlota City, notched 6.5 points in seven games to grab the junior division gold medal, P5,000 in cash and a ticket to the national grand finals.

Silver medalist Ervil Villa, a Colegio de San Agustin-Bacolod management student earned P4,000 plus a finals slot.

Veteran Shell chess kiddie campaigner Asuela went undefeated in seven games. He took the kiddie division gold medal, P4,000 and a seat to the finals. Second-seeded Roque Quebrar took the silver medal, P3,000 and a finalist slot.

Bacolod's West Negros College fielded 30 entries to earn the "Schools Most Represented Award" while 4-year-old Vincent Karl Lopez took the "Youngest Participant Award." About 30 percent of the 305-entry list were female chess players.

BY JUNE NAVARRO

MOBILINE aims for a trouble-free entry to the quarterfinals, while Red Bull and Purefoods jockey for strategic positions today at the end of the elimination round of the PBA Commissioners' Cup at the PhilSports Arena.

The Phone Pals must beat Sta. Lucia Realty in the main encounter at 7:30 p.m. to avert the possibility of a four-way logjam at the lower rung of the standings. A victory will automatically shove the Phone Pals to the next round while a defeat will put them in the company of cellar-dwellers Pop Cola, Tanduay and Shell, all touting 3-6 slates.

Such situation will pit the Phone Pals against the Zoommasters and the Panthers opposite the Rhummasters in a rubber match on Friday.

Winners of both matches advance outright to the next round with the team which has a higher quotient securing the seventh quarterfinal slot.

In the event of a Mobiline triumph, however, the Phone Pals will secure the fifth quarterfinal spot, while Sta. Lucia and Barangay Ginebra take No. 6 and 7, respectively.

Shell and Tanduay will then have to slug it out with the winner facing the Panthers in a do-or-die match for the last slot in the quarters.

Red Bull and Purefoods, squads safely perched at the top, scramble for the No. 2 spot in the curtain-raiser. Like San Miguel and Alaska, Red Bull and Purefoods are already assured of twice-to-beat incentives going into the quarterfinals.

The Aces, through the heads-up plays of comebacking import Sean Chambers, secured the incentive with a 101-67 trashing of the Phone Pals last Sunday.

Counted out of the running after absorbing setbacks left and right, the Zoommasters returned from oblivion after dethroning the Kings, 85-75, to keep their hopes alive as far as a slot in the quarterfinals is concerned.

Meanwhile, the PBA Press Corps is requesting the second batch of participants in the PBA sportswriting contest to be at the venue at 4:30 p.m.

For information, please call the PBA office at 638-1815 to 17 and look for Joy Lopez and Hazel Ancheta.

N. Ecija tries to end 4-game losing streak

Games Today
(Araullo Centrum Gym, Cabanatuan City)
3 p.m.—Socargen vs Cebuana Lhuillier
5:30 p.m.—Fedex Laguna vs Nueva Ecija

NUEVA Ecija aims to end its four-game slump when it hosts Fedex Laguna today in the 2001 MBA First Phase at the Araullo Centrum Gym in Cabanatuan City.

The outcome of their 5 p.m. match might decide both teams' fate in the next round. The Lakers are at fifth spot with a 3-5 slate, a full game ahead of the Patriots' 2-6 record.

Fedex Laguna won its first match over Nueva Ecija, 111-100, two weeks back in Sta. Cruz, Laguna but a repeat could be unlikely since the Patriots are unbeaten at home with wins over Socargen (108-93) and Davao (107-93).

Nueva Ecija coach Jojo Villa is also seeking to end his wards' losing streak. The Patriots latest last came last Sunday against Negros, 88-96.

Meanwhile, Socargen, currently at the bottom of the standings with a 2-8 slate, hopes to erase the stigma of its last visit to Cabanatuan City when it shoots for a win over fancied Cebuana Lhuillier in the curtain-raiser at 3 p.m.

UAAP ACTION

Armstrong's Tour just starting

AIX-LES-BAINS, France—After 10 days of racing, Lance Armstrong's Tour de France is just starting. Nine stages and a prologue left the two-time defending champion 23rd in the overall standings, 35 minutes and 19 seconds behind the yellow jersey-wearer, Stuart O'Grady. That was before the Tour hit the mountains. From Tuesday, riders spend five stages tackling exceptionally difficult climbs that force many competitors to abandon the event. Armstrong was expected to make his mark on the race in the first mountain stage, a 209-kilometer (129.79-mile) stretch from Aix-les-Bains to L'Alpe d'Huez, high in the French Alps.

Ivanisevic skips Canada tourney

MONTREAL—Wimbledon champion Goran Ivanisevic will skip the Tennis Masters Series Canada in order to rest an injured shoulder. After his unexpected triumph at the All England Club two weeks ago, Ivanisevic postponed shoulder surgery to meet a crowded tennis schedule. But since he has already earned a spot in this fall's Masters Cup championship, the Croat can afford to miss the Montreal tournament, which runs from July 28-Aug. 5. However, he plans to play the Hamlet Cup, a US Open tuneup in New York held Aug. 18-26.

Blow By Blow tonight on 13

TWO of the country's most exciting featherweights—No. 6 ranked Fernando Montilla and No. 9 Arman Molina—clash in the San Miguel Beer main event of the popular weekly boxing show Blow by Blow at 10 tonight over Viva Television—IBC 13. The 23-year-old Montilla of Davao has a record of 26 wins, 17 by knockout, while the 30-year-old Molina from Misamis Oriental has a record of 37 wins with 10 knockouts. IBF world super bantamweight champion Manny Pacquiao, a product of "Blow by Blow" will be special guest at the fights.

Astros repulse Indians

HOUSTON — Vinny Castilla's tiebreaking, three-run double in the eighth inning helped Houston come back from five runs down to beat Cleveland 10-8 in a thriller.

The Astros trailed 6-1 before rallying with three runs in the fifth, one in the sixth and five in the eighth.

Pitcher John Rocker has struggled since coming to Cleveland from Atlanta on June 22, blowing two of four save chances and posting an 8.31 ERA. The Indians have lost three straight games.

Ron Villone (3-3) pitched the eighth for the win as the Astros moved within two games of the Chicago Cubs in the National League Central.

Billy Wagner allowed a two-run homer in the ninth to Roberto Alomar — his second of the game.

Reds 9, Tigers 1
Ken Griffey Jr. hit two of Cincinnati's four homers as the Reds beat the Detroit Tigers 9-1 in Cincinnati.

Rookie starting pitcher Lance Davis (2-1) gave up five hits in Cincinnati's first complete game this season, outpitching Detroit's Adam Pettyjohn in a matchup of rookie left-handers.

Pizza delivery boy strangled by dangling telephone line

BY JEROME ANING

A PIZZA delivery boy on a motorcycle died in a freak accident in Ermita, Manila before dawn yesterday. He ran into a severed, dangling telephone line that caught him in the neck and strangled him. The phone line tightened around the neck of Rolan Nolasco, 21, as one end was caught and pulled tight by a passing jeepney, strangling the young man and dragging his body on the street, said SPO4 Virgo Villareal of the Western Police District homicide section. Nolasco, a delivery boy of Shakey's Pizza in Malate and a resident of 578 Hermosa Street Extension in Gagalangin, Tondo, had just delivered pizza to a customer in Tondo and was on his way back to the pizza parlor when the accident took place, police said.

Villareal said the phone cable that runs along M.H. Del Pilar Street was severed when it was hit by a cement mixer truck around 11:30 p.m. Monday.

Around 2:30 a.m., both the jeepney and Nolasco's motorcycle were on the south-bound lane of M. H. Del Pilar when the dangling phone line got snagged on the jeepney's right side mirror.

The wire caught the neck of Nolasco, who was overtaking the jeepney. As Nolasco struggled to get the wire off, the jeepney continued to move fast, tightening the wire and strangling the delivery boy, police said.

Nolasco's body was pulled off the motorcycle and was dragged by the jeepney for several meters.

Witnesses later told SPO4 Villareal that the unidentified driver stopped the jeepney and got off, but only to untie the wire from his side mirror. Then he boarded and drove away.

Hans Ramos, a passenger of a passing FX taxi, saw the accident and brought Nolasco to the Ospital ng Maynila, where the victim was pronounced dead.

1 killed, 2 wounded in running gunfight

BY NELSON F. FLORES

POLICE yesterday killed one suspected robber and wounded two others in a running gun battle that started in Makati City and ended in Parañaque.

Senior Supt. Jose Gutierrez, Southern Police District director, identified the dead suspect as Richard Balatingaw, a resident of Manila. Balatingaw died on the way to the Ospital ng Makati.

The wounded suspect, Raymond Solomon, 22, of Onyx Street, San Andres, Manila, is in critical condition in the same hospital, Gutierrez said.

Murderer of granny gets death

By PHILIP C. TUBEZA

THE QUEZON City Regional Trial Court yesterday sentenced to death a man who robbed and brutally murdered his own 76-year-old grandmother two years ago.

Branch 103 Judge Jaime Salazar sent Alfredo Montallana Ramos Jr., of Talipapa in Novaliches, Quezon City, to the death chamber after he found the accused guilty of killing his grandmother, Melissa Montallana, inside her home at 15 San Antonio de Padua St. at Villa Sabina Subdivision in Talipapa.

Ramos was said to have been high on illegal drugs when he killed his grandmother, a retired schoolteacher, on June 10, 1999.

The judge ordered Ramos to pay the victim's family a total of P205,750 in damages.

A third man identified only as Ryan managed to escape, although police believed he, too, was critically wounded in the exchange.

Gutierrez said a manhunt was underway for the third man, who he said could also bleed to death if he would not surrender immediately.

Gutierrez said police teams under Chief Insp. Eduardo Balmaceda, Makati City police operations chief, had waited in strategic parts of the South Luzon Expressway after they received reports that three men on board a Toyota Corolla had been robbing motorists on the highway since Monday night.

At 4:30 a.m., a police unit detailed at the Merville-Kalayaan Road Exit of the expressway spotted the suspects on board the Corolla (URE 375) and tried to flag them down.

But the suspects reportedly refused to slow down and even opened fire at the lawmen just as the Corolla sped past the checkpoint on the southbound lane of the expressway, Gutierrez said.

The lawmen pursued the suspects. Other police units joined the chase, which soon turned into a full-blown shootout, Gutierrez said.

But the suspects lost control of their car and smashed into a concrete barrier of the expressway, Gutierrez said.

Police found the two suspects in the car. The third suspect managed to flee. Makati investigators said the suspects were responsible for at least three robberies on the South Luzon Expressway since Monday night.

Among their recent victims were Allan Batalyer, Dennis Mallari and Christian Yango. Investigators said the suspects took the cellular phones, jewelry and cash of the victims while they were driving on the expressway Monday night and early Tuesday morning.

THEY confessed to the misdeed and said they have returned the missing goodies intended for distressed boxers in the Mandaluyong City stable.

They said they did not mean to do it.

Forget about everything, I told them.

They left looking very relieved and walked under the thin evening drizzle.

They themselves looked lost, undrilled. I knew they had had to help themselves to the donated goodies out of necessity. They have their own hungry children to feed.

How I wished I could've given them something. But the remaining extra cans of tuna and packets of instant noodles, which I had handled the night before to a godson who was uprooted after the factory in the next barangay where he worked closed shop.

Carding, with three kids to feed, now stays in Laguna, earns P160 a day and walks to the poultry feed factory where he works.

You're luckier, I told this godson, because many poor families here practically have to scratch the earth every day to avoid going cold and hungry.

Anyway, we are supposed to feel a little relieved.

The Mandaluyong City government, through Mayor Benhur Abalos, has vowed renewed support for the boxers in its stable who had threatened to mutiny last week.

These, indeed, are very trying times

BARE EYE

Recah Trinidad

You see, there has been renewed enthusiasm over boxing here following the sensational world title triumph of Manny Pacquiao in Las Vegas.

President Gloria Macapagal-Arroyo, herself looking very excited, battled for the modernization of professional boxing in the Philippines.

She indeed sounded sincere and serious in voicing her intent.

Sorry, but so far, nothing significant has been done by sports authorities to put flesh to the President's lofty plans for boxing.

Last heard of, the President even congratulated herself for having won over enormous investments from Philip Morris whose products, no doubt, will lessen the chances of countless young citizens to excel in boxing and other sports.

It's now easy to suspect, after her display of genuine concern, that the President's announced plans would not even reach the planning stage.

President Macapagal indeed earned some solid points with her announced support for the sport that had given the country its brightest moments internationally.

But those points will have to be nullified until the so-called modernization (of boxing) is able to take off the ground.

Anyway, Sen. Gringo Honasan has written this reporter a personal note to thank us for the "effort to establish an academy for aspiring boxers."

Said Honasan: "Such an endeavor would greatly help young fighters ranging to slug it out in the ring while learning the basics of the sport. Rest assured that you can count on my support for your worthy cause."

He also said he would file a bill in the 12th Congress on providing incentives for athletes who excel in international competitions.

Now, for an update on the proposed boxing academy.

Jimmy Zuno, a fight manager who has helped send several Filipino boxers abroad, has come up with a planned curriculum.

As you very well know, sportsman Tony Aldeguer has wholeheartedly offered the facilities of his modern gym in Cebu for the endeavor.

Sportsman Rudy Salud says he's 110 percent behind the project; while his ward, Gerry Peñalosa, has offered to be one of the resource persons.

Last week, Philippine Sportswriters Association (PSA) president Lito Tacujan agreed to help run and supervise the planned academy.

Everything is being carried out very carefully to ensure its success.

And it would indeed be great if the academy doesn't end up as the undertaking of a single individual alone but of one or two prestigious institutions like the PSA and a big commercial firm.

No, we can no longer hope and pray for presidential blessing or support.

We know too well how President Macapagal is practically down on her knees trying to solve all the monumental problems and troubles hounding and hobbling her administration and the distressed Filipino people.

You see, we even dared to play it very pretty and write about the missing donated goodies for hungry boxers in one city gym.

As we had noted earlier, it was hard to truly blame those who had helped themselves to the donated goods.

These are very trying times indeed.

Look, if the President herself could risk the health of countless citizens, young and old alike, by hosting a certified cancer machine like Philip Morris, we cannot condemn other poor souls who had to do anything to avoid dying of hunger.

Let's just hope and pray that the enormous foreign tobacco investments on local shores would not end up as an idea to help fund the modernization of RP boxing, as had been proposed by the President.

It would no longer be funny, if that happens.

Atienza sets land-swap deadline

By JEROME ANING

MANILA Mayor Lito Atienza yesterday said he is giving government agencies and private groups who want to save the Mehan Gardens only two more weeks to convince the Department of Tourism to give up the old Ateneo de Manila lot in Intramuros as an alternative site for the new City College of Manila campus.

Atienza said the city government is "excited" at the prospect of relocating the CCM campus to Intramuros, but he said the proposed land-swap "should be resolved soon because we have to prepare for next year's enrollment of CCM students."

"We want them to have a new campus by next school year," the mayor said in a press statement. He warned that if no decision would be made after two weeks, the City Hall would have no choice but to continue the construction of the new campus on the Mehan.

It has been more than a week since the search team formed by the Department of the Environment and Natural Resources identified the old Ateneo site as an alternative site for the CCM campus.

The property is administered by the Intramuros Administration, an attached agency of the DOT.

The construction of the CCM campus on the 140-year-old Mehan was ordered temporarily halted on June 28 by the DENR after the private contractor was found to have cut and pruned trees without permission.

Atienza said the city government would request the DOT to give up the property in exchange for the 24,600-square-meter Mehan.

"We will do our share in convincing the DOT to give up the property and we expect those who proposed the alternative site to make strong representations with the DOT," Atienza said.

The National Historical Institute, the National Commission for Culture and the Arts, the National Museum and various private conservationist and environmentalist groups want the Mehan to remain a public park to preserve its historical and cultural legacy as the first zoological and botanical garden in the capital.

But Atienza said only one-third of the park would be used and that the new buildings would actually enhance the place.

The mayor warned that the city government "cannot wait indefinitely" for the acquisition of the old Ateneo.

"This project has been approved by the city council and there are no legal impediments," he explained. "We have to continue with our development plans for the city."

He said the City Hall would remain steadfast in its commitment to provide the poor students of the CCM the quality education that they deserve.

Shooting champ Jethro Dionisio robbed of guns

BY PHILIP C. TUBEZA

FORMER world speed shooting champion Jethro Dionisio lost about P2 million worth of firearms and gun paraphernalia to burglars who broke into his gun store in Quezon City.

Dionisio, of 02 Mendez Road in Baesa, Quezon City, reported to police that his Jethro International Inc. store at 49-D G. Araneta Avenue in Barangay Santol, Quezon City was burglarized Sunday, said investigator PO3 Joseph Mortel, of the Central Police District-Criminal Investigation Unit.

Dionisio was the first Filipino to win the world speed shooting title.

Police said the robbers took 17 different firearms, three gun frames, 17 gun slides, 29 gun barrel pieces, two gun reloaders, three firing shades, a BPI check worth P21,750 and P3,500 in cash.

Dionisio, police said, is still determining if other items were taken from his store.

Police said the break-in happened while the store was closed between 11 p.m. Sunday and 7:15 a.m. Monday. The robbers apparently took advantage of the rains, police said.

The burglars entered the store by destroying the lock of the steel front door, police said.

Inside, they ransacked the store, destroying the vault and even managing to take two gun reloaders that were big and heavy and were screwed to the wall, police said.

SPD chief foils rob try, nabs 2 suspects

BY NELSON F. FLORES

SOUTHERN Police District Office Director Senior Supt. Jose Gutierrez personally foiled a robbery attempt on Monday and arrested the suspects in Makati City.

Gutierrez identified the suspects as Teresa Jalarida, 19, of M.H. Del Pilar St., Barangay Rizal, Makati City, and Reynaldo Porcioncula, 24, of Jacinto Street, Barangay Bambang, Pasig City.

Gutierrez said the suspects had just tried to rob Lino Santos, 46, a taxi driver and resident of Orquidia Street, Barangay Pembo, also in Makati City.

Investigation showed that Gutierrez, who was on his way to the SPDO headquarters in Taguig, foiled the robbery attempt about 4:30 p.m. Monday along McKinley Road in Barangay Forbes.

Gutierrez said he was on board his service vehicle when he spotted Santos running away from his taxicab, which was parked on McKinley Road.

He said he also saw the suspects who were apparently about to run after Santos. He said he alighted from his vehicle and introduced himself as a law enforcer.

But upon seeing him and his close-in security personnel who were armed with M-16 rifles, the suspects immediately surrendered, Gutierrez said.

He said two fan knives were also found on the suspects.

Upon interrogation, the suspects told Gutierrez that Porcioncula wanted to celebrate his 24th birthday but had no money so they decided to stage a robbery.

Santos said the robbers flagged his taxi down near the Guadalupe Commercial Center and asked him to bring them to The Fort. He said they announced the holdup when they reached McKinley Road. He said that was when he decided to jump off his taxi.

The suspects are now detained at the Makati City Jail, and are facing charges of illegal possession of deadly weapons and frustrated robbery before the Makati City Prosecutor's Office.

RCBC robber known, getaway car found

BY ALCUIN PAPA

POLICE have identified one of the suspects in the robbery of a Rizal Commercial Bank Corp. (RCBC) branch in Quezon City and found the getaway vehicle in Pasay City.

According to Senior Insp. Samuel Turla, chief of the Pasay City police station 6, a gray Honda Civic (WHF-732) was recovered in the city by SPO1 Alredo Llanillo, PO1 Jose Acopio and PO1 Silvano Martillano.

Investigation revealed that the car was abandoned by a lone male suspect last Friday around 4 p.m. at the parking lot of the San Jacinto Restaurant on Taft Avenue near Edsa.

Investigators learned that the car was used in the robbery of the RCBC branch in Quezon City last week.

It was also the same car used by men who held up AMA Computer College students Bernard Velasco and Ma. Cristina Linda Soriano, police said.

Turla said that found inside the Honda Civic were a lady's handbag with papers from AMA school in the name of Soriano.

They learned from AMA authorities that Soriano was held up last week while she and Velasco were on board Soriano's Mitsubishi Adventure (WCF-324) in Novaliches.

Turla said a witness described a suspect who was last seen with the Honda Civic. The suspect was described as between 35 and 40 years old, 5-foot-8, with short hair, stocky and wearing denim walking shorts and a long-sleeved T-shirt. Turla and members of the Central Police District are coordinating closely to solve the RCBC bank robbery.

Fake shampoos seized

BY JEROME ANING

NATIONAL Bureau of Investigation agents seized P500,000 in fake shampoo and hair products during a raid on two warehouses in Quiapo, Manila the other day.

Director Reynaldo Wycoco of the NBI said the raid stemmed from a complaint filed by Unilever Philippines Inc. which, through its counsel R.V. Domingo & Associates, requested the bureau to investigate and prosecute wholesalers and importers of counterfeit products bearing their trademark.

NBI agents conducted surveillance and learned that the 808 General Merchandise was storing counterfeit products in their warehouses on Norzagaray and Castillejos streets.

The NBI obtained a search warrant from Manila regional trial court Judge Antonio Eugenio Jr. then conducted the raid.

Agents seized from the warehouses several wooden crates containing plastic bottles and sachets of fake Vaseline shampoo, Lux shampoo and Crème Silk conditioners worth P500,000.

Malonzo threatens to sue Tancangco

BY CHRISTIAN V. ESGUERRA

CALOOCAN OIC Mayor Reynaldo Malonzo yesterday threatened to file charges against Commissioner Luz Tancangco of the Commission on Elections for "preempting" the decision on a petition to declare an election failure in the city.

Malonzo criticized Tancangco for announcing in a radio interview yesterday that she had voted in favor of the petition to declare an election failure in Caloocan. The petition was filed by former Rep. Luis "Baby" Asistio and his brother, ex-mayor Macario "Boy" Asistio Jr.

Tancangco wrote the decision.

"Her statement is uncalled for," Malonzo said. "It's unethical. It proves that she's biased in favor of my political opponents."

Tancangco told Radio Mindanao Network that she granted the petition of the Asistios to declare an election failure in Caloocan. She also admitted that she wrote the decision.

But she clarified that her decision was personal and that other commissioners could still overrule it.

Malonzo said Tancangco should not have made the statement since the Comelec has yet to release its official decision on the petition.

Malonzo said he would file appropriate charges against Tancangco "after the election mess is over."

Malonzo earlier claimed he had won a third straight term in the mayoral race over rival Baby Asistio.

President Gloria Macapagal-Arroyo appointed Malonzo and most of his partymates as officers in charge in Caloocan pending the decision on the Asistio petition. The Asistios in their petition asked the Comelec to declare an election failure in Caloocan since they said many voters were disenfranchised.

They accused Malonzo and other local officials of deliberately delaying the distribution of election materials on election day,

May 14, to disenfranchise voters.

The office of city treasurer Lourdes Jose was tasked to organize the distribution of materials in the city's two districts.

Man kills younger brother in drinking fight

BLOOD might be thicker than water, but alcohol can blind even siblings and lead them to kill each other.

Monday afternoon in Quezon City, a 30-year-old man killed his younger brother when they fought during a drinking bust.

Privado Ballinas, of Area 6, Luzon Avenue, Quezon City, stabbed dead his brother

Jim, 27, when they got in an argument, said investigator PO2 Roger Esteves of the Central Police District-Criminal Investigation Unit (CPD-CIU).

The brothers were drinking outside their house when they started arguing about 2:30 p.m. Monday, Esteves said. Police are still trying to find out what sparked the misunderstanding that turned fatal, Esteves added.

He said that both brothers were already drunk when their quarrel started. Privado pulled out a knife and stabbed his younger brother.

Responding policemen arrested the suspect, who is now detained at the CPD-CIU jail in Camp Karingal at Sikatuna Village in Quezon City.

LOUIE C. CAMINO, Editor

Mikey Arroyo makes his bid as leading man in the movies

A NEW Filipino movie, "Mahal Kita, Kahit Sino Ka Pa," is opening in Metro Manila theaters today. Local films open every week no big deal, so why is there an unusually noisy buzz about this one? Well, it stars Judy Ann Santos—and the President's son, Mickey Macapagal-Arroyo.

People are curious about the movie because they want to see for themselves if Mikey can act. Actually they had many chances to do that in the past, since Mikey has been acting in films for four years now.

We've caught a number of those movies, and can report that they were generally budget action films toppling second-tier stars, and Mikey played only supporting and second-lead roles in them.

What about his acting ability? Well, if memory serves, he came across as eager and enthusiastic, but wasn't really given scenes that were intense or complex enough to reveal his depth as an actor. So, when it comes to Mikey's thespic talent, the jury is still out on that score.

Which is one reason why "Mahal Kita..." could be a dodgy proposition for him. It's the first movie he's topbilled, so some people will naturally wonder why it took his mom's becoming president for Mikey to finally be given his initial lead role.

VIEWFINDER

Nestor U. Torre

All sorts of reasons can be advanced to explain such a "coincidence," but let's face it, the two events are inextricably linked. Nor should that be something that Mikey should apologize for.

After all, in this country, show biz and politics have been not so strange bedfellows since the time of Ferdinand Marcos: Imee produced and acted, Irene conducted, and even Bongbong had a cameo role in a historical film on Filipino nationhood.

Cory Aquino? Kris is the most visible example, going straight from chirpy teenager to film and then TV star.

Fidel Ramos? Jo sang and had her own group, and went on to marry movie star Lloyd Samartino.

Joseph Estrada? Both Jinggoy and Jude tried to approximate his success in the movies. So, why should Gloria Macapagal-Arroyo and her progeny be any different?

Of course, some children of heads of state take advantage of their own popularity or "reflected celebrity" to launch show biz careers for themselves. Some of them make it, while others don't.

If Mikey Macapagal-Arroyo does well in his first lead role, there'll be no fuss made over his "sudden" stardom. However, if he comes across as nervous, awkward, lacking in thespic intensity or trying-hard, watch out for a cacophony of cat-calls—and run for cover!

$500-M RP bond float faces delay

By CLARISSA S. BATINO

WHILE the terms of the $500-million bond deal may have been carved in stone, US-based investment bank Credit Suisse First Boston is planning to defer the offering of the global bonds by at least a month when market conditions on emerging markets shall have improved.

A senior finance official said the bond offer may be postponed as spreads on emerging market borrowings continued to widen because of fears that Argentina would default on $24 billion worth of maturing loans this year.

Even Bangko Sentral Governor Rafael Buenaventura said he would not be surprised if the investment bank would postpone the bond float to a later date.

"If they postpone it for 30 days, I wouldn't be surprised because of the (current) condition of the market. But the terms would have to be intact," the central bank chief said.

Buenaventura supported the stand of Finance Secretary Jose Isidro Camacho that the pricing and other terms of the $500-million, 10-year global bond offering could not be re-negotiated.

However, Buenaventura said the investment bank could choose a better timing for the offering.

"The only problem is that the inflow we are expecting would also be delayed. But if ever, it would only be delayed by a month or so," the central bank governor said. "We are mindful of the current market conditions. We expect that the completion of the documentation process and suitable market conditions for a successful issue will coincide," Camacho said.

The financial market has been abuzz with talks that Credit Suisse had been trying to re-negotiate the terms, particularly the pricing of the bond issue. The US-based investment bank has reportedly committed to "firmly underwrite" the $500-million 10-year global bond issue of the Philippine government with a yield of 5.1 percentage points over 10-year US treasury bond rate.

As sole "bookrunner" for the $500-million deal, the US-based investment bank would be tasked to farm out the debt notes to other investment banks.

But pricing problems because of threats that Argentina would default on its loans and thus affect other emerging markets like the Philippines would leave Credit Suisse with no other choice but to hold on to the bonds if no other buyers will be brave enough to take them.

Credit Suisse was among the seven banks also coordinating the roadshow that the finance department had scheduled late this month. The roadshow has been postponed to a later date so as not to coincide with the bond float.

It had earlier raised $200 million for the government through a private placement.

Sources said that spreads on emerging market borrowings rose by at least a percentage point since reports of Argentina's possible default reached the market two weeks ago.

STOCK MARKET

Stocks down

STOCKS closed weaker yesterday due to a double whammy of profit-taking on food conglomerate San Miguel Corp. and the drop of the peso to fresh six-month lows.

Traders said San Miguel was ripe for cash calls following gains of about 10 percent in the last few weeks on news it was bidding to acquire 85 percent of soft drink firm Cosmos Bottling Corp.

Cosmos' parent RFM Corp. said it expects to decide on the buyer for Cosmos within the week.

Meanwhile, the peso further slipped to 53.95 to the dollar in morning trade from its Monday close of 53.71 on hedging and dollar short-covering, dealers said.

"The drop of the market is highly influenced by the peso.

It's a reality check... Beyond 53 (pesos), it's a different range already, we're going back to record lows (for the local currency)," said Joan Buena-Eala, fund manager of Bank of the Philippine Islands Trust.

Banks chip in P100M for new exchange

By ELENA R. TORRIJOS

THE BANKERS Association of the Philippines, composed of the country's more than 40 commercial banks, last week approved a P100-million investment for the establishment of a fixed-income exchange that has a potential for P1 trillion in trades.

In an interview, BAP executive director Leonilo Coronel said the BAP was preparing information kits for a roadshow in the next two weeks to raise investments for the balance of the planned exchange's P500-million capital base.

The Investment Houses Association of the Philippines, insurance companies and large corporate debt issuers such as food and beverage conglomerate San Miguel Corp. and oil giant Shell were among those being considered as possible investors, Coronel said.

The exchange, which will allow trading of various fixed-income instruments such as government securities and commercial paper, should be set up within the year, he added.

The BAP executive explained that, eventually, the exchange could lead to lower interest rates or borrowing costs for companies as a result of possibly higher demand and increased transparency.

The exchange will also provide a venue for individuals and organizations to dispose of their debt papers immediately without having to resort to buyback or repurchase agreements with financial institutions.

Initially, the exchange will trade government securities, the secondary trading of which is not subject to documentary stamps tax under a ruling by the Bureau of Internal Revenue.

Several associations involved in the country's capital markets are pushing the government to support legislation lifting the tax on secondary trades of commercial paper and asset-backed securities, among others.

Coronel noted that there were about P1 trillion in outstanding government securities and this figure represented the potential amount of paper that could be traded on the planned fixed-income exchange.

The BAP's investment will represent a 20-percent stake in the fixed-income exchange. Under the Securities Regulation Code, a single industry group can only have a maximum 20-percent stake in any local exchange while an individual can have up to 5 percent.

METRO Rail Transit Corp. yesterday insisted that the proposed 5-kilometer extension of the Edsa mass rail transit (MRT) from its North Edsa station to Monumento was the key to putting the project on track to profitability.

MRTC chair Robert John Sobrepeña said the extension would finally complete a transport loop between Lines 1 (Light Rail Transit) and 3 (Edsa MRT), which should boost passenger volume on both routes.

The LRT runs from Monumento to Baclaran while the Edsa MRT line stops at LRT's Taft Avenue station. The 5-km extension would allow commuters access to both lines and enable Edsa MRT to capture a sizable chunk of passengers from North Metro Manila.

Sobrepeña said the Edsa MRT line was not viable because of its marginal traffic—average of 270,000 commuters a day—and the low fare. "The government can only make the MRT viable and reduce or wipe out its subsidies by completing the loop and raising the fare when the economy has recovered," Sobrepeña said.

The MRTC consortium has been blamed for rail-roading a deal, which critics said ensured the group of a 15-percent annual return on their $190-million equity investments even if the Edsa MRT was not running profitably. MRTC is made up of Fil-Estate Management Inc., Ayala Land Inc., Anglo-Philippine Holdings Corp., Greenfield Development Corp.,

Ramcar Inc., Allante Realty and Development Inc.

Sobrepeña said that the terms of the build-lease-transfer contract were originally made during the Aquino administration with businessman Eli Levin as the private party. He said MRTC took over the project during the Ramos administration under the same BLT contract with some revisions that made it more attractive for the government.

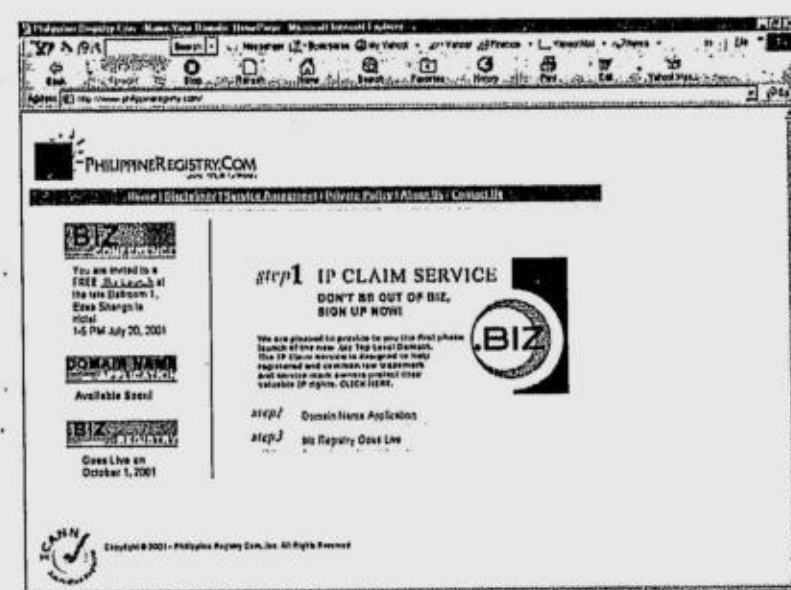

This included a cut in the internal rate of return from 20 percent to 15 percent and government's lease payments were changed from straight line (equal payments over 25 years) to a back-end schedule (where the bulk of payments are made only at the latter part of the contract). "We would start getting returns starting on the 15th year from start of operations or after all the loans have been paid," Sobrepeña said.

He said critics fail to realize that the BLT was a better option than the build-transfer mode. "Under a BT, the government should have paid lump sum after the project's completion unlike the BLT where the payment is spread over 25 years."

He said the loan guarantees were necessary considering the project's risk and cap on investment returns. "We were not the only company granted government guarantee. No company would touch the project unless there is a guarantee."

He said the project would not work under a build-operate-transfer mode because almost all transport systems in the world were operating on government subsidies. "We invested in the project despite MRT/B5

Internet domain name registry opens in RP

WHAT'S in a name? In the Internet, it is everything.

Similar to real-world trademarks, domain names like CocaCola.com or Microsoft.com are virtual gateways to information about a company. Without a domain name, one will not have Web presence or a Web address that allows customers to view on the Internet the latest services and products that a company offers.

It is in this light that the Internet Corporation for Assigned Names and Numbers (ICANN)—the body overseeing the global domain name management system and licensing of domain name registrars—decided to put up .biz, a top-level Internet domain strictly for business.

ICANN added .biz to earlier domains such as .com, .org and .net. ICANN accredited PhilippineRegistry.com Inc. to operate as a global TLD name registry.

Many will remember that domain names such as Ayala.com, Sanmiguel.com, Unionbank.com and Megaworld.com were acquired by individuals, groups or companies based in the US or other parts of the world way before the larger Manila-based corporations filed applications to acquire them.

PhilippineRegistry.com gives Filipino companies the advantage of filing for .biz domain names early and greater chances of acquiring their domain names before other registrants from elsewhere in the world get them.

"biz is mainly designed for business. It aims to protect brand names. The .com domain has often been misclassified. With the "first-come-first-serve" system adopted in serving .com name applications, anyone and everyone has been able to register and have a .com domain names," says Adriel Mirto, vice chair of PhilippineRegistry.com.

Filipino businesses may now avail themselves of the .biz domain and expand their presence on the Internet, something that no business today can do without. Mirto said PhilippineRegistry.com would follow the strict ICANN procedures in giving out .biz domain names to clients.

To launch the company and .biz, PhilippineRegistry.com will host a conference on the importance of domain name registration for business on July 20 at the Edsa Shangri-La Plaza Hotel.

Dogfight over new Naia

COCKTALES

By Victor C. Agustin

IT is now becoming clear how the six taipans, the original proponents of the Ninoy Aquino International Airport Terminal 3 project, had been edged out by the German-financed consortium currently building the new terminal at the former Nichols air base.

Whereas the taipans only proposed to build the passenger terminal, the German consortium offered a bigger share of the revenue pie to the government by—this is their secret weapon—inserting a monopoly provision for all airport services in the construction contract.

In exchange for P17.75 billion in guaranteed government revenues (as claimed by the German consortium in full-page ads Monday) and other unknown considerations, the Erap administration awarded not only the construction of the new terminal but, here's the windfall, the exclusive management of airport, cargo, ground-handling, and meal/inflight services for 25 years to the German-led Philippine International Air Terminals Co. Inc.

What is wrong with that? Ostensibly nothing, except that a foreign firm would displace a number of local firms now sharing the business once the terminal opens by late next year. Welcome to globalization.

Since the Piatco contract remains a closely guarded secret—strange for a B-O-T contract of this magnitude—it is only now, after Erap's ouster, that the slew of local cargo and airport groundhandling firms have realized that they had been shut out of the Terminal 3 action.

Worse, the current Naia Terminal 1, where the local players are divvying up the crisis-shrunken pie, would be closed down for international flights, with all international flights being funneled to the new Terminal 3 once it opens.

With Terminal 1 being shut down and converted to a domestic terminal, and Terminal 3 having shut them out, where would these local entrepreneurs go?

Meanwhile, Philippine Airlines, which has been using the Terminal 2 courtesy of the Erap administration to the exclusion of others, joined the ruckus by saying it would not relocate its international flights to Terminal 3 despite the Erap-blessed mandate that Piatco now holds.

In this fight, PAL's kapitan Lucio Tan may have unwittingly boxed himself in with his almost slavish support for the goonish ex-actor from San Juan during the latter's rough-riding days. To paraphrase an Erap-era putdown: Pinondohan ninyo, magtiis kayo.

Put another way, how can the taipan now cry wolf when he himself let the wolf into his own home?

Bebot's tormentor

TRANSPORTATION Secretary Pantaleon "Bebot" Alvarez may not know it, but the series of anti-

Alvarez press releases and newspaper ads against him have been orchestrated by the PR consultant of the Public Estates Authority.

What in heaven's name would a government flak hit a government flagship project and a Cabinet secretary at that?

In addition to slinging potshots at Alvarez, the PR consultant has also been throwing mud at the German principals of Piatco, despite the fact that the PR consultant also counts the German car manufacturer BMW/Prestige Cars as clients.

Hole by the mail

IF you are wondering what that large hole beside the PowerPlant Mall is, that is the basement for the planned luxury hotel of the Lopezes.

With the economy still not picking up a sustained tigerish pace that had been hoped for during the go-go Ramos years, the Lopezes decided to defer indefinitely the construction of the six-star hotel originally reserved for Ritz-Carlton.

To make the space productive, Nestor Padilla, president of the Lopez-controlled Rockwell Land, is in the meantime building a multi-level, open-roofed badminton courts. These subterranean courts should be ready by October.

Heard through the grapevine

OUSTED Manila Polo Club president Antonio M. Garcia flew out of the country last week but not after having purportedly written a two-page letter explaining why he had to leave the board in a huff.

The letter, unfortunately unsigned, details the horse-tradings and petty crimes that allegedly afflict even supposedly genteel country clubs.

SUBIC FREEPORT

Taiwan to infuse more investments

SUBIC BAY FREEPORT—Taiwanese business leaders accompanying Taiwanese Economic Minister Hsin-I Lin in his Philippine visit have pledged to pour more investments in Subic Bay Freeport.

The freeport is the site of a 300-hectare industrial park that has grown into an overseas manufacturing base for Taiwan over the past five years.

The business delegation, composed of chief executive officers of companies that rank among the biggest in Taiwan, is headed by Jeffrey Koo, chair of the Chinatrust Commercial Bank and the Chinese National Association of Industry and Commerce (CNAIC).

Manufacturing conglomerate Far Eastern Group, which has $21.8 billion in assets, led the businesses that expressed "serious interest" in establishing overseas operations in Subic.

Gov't needs firm policy on granting of guarantees

BY CLARISSA S. BATINO

(Conclusion)

A WEEK after she took her oath of office, President Macapagal-Arroyo asked all departments and agencies of the government to live within their means and demonstrate simple lifestyle. Officials were asked to refrain from using the expensive vehicles bought by the previous administration. The highly paid ones were asked to take salary cuts and to forego some perks.

The moves were aimed at cutting off unnecessary expenditures that put further pressure on the government's tight budget.

An important part of the process is the review of all sovereign guarantees extended by the previous administration that tend to bloat the already swollen budget deficit.

The government has been doing the review very carefully and quietly because the bulk of these were signed not during the term of everybody's usual suspect, deposed President Estrada, but under that of former President Fidel V. Ramos.

Inherited projects

Technically, Argentinian-led CBK Power Corp. obtained a risk undertaking, a form of government guarantee, not from Estrada who was called the "unwitting godfather" of Impsa Asia Ltd. when the contract with the National Power Corp. was sealed, but from the current administration.

The Macapagal administration approved the risk undertaking on the strength of a Department of Justice opinion that favored the extension of guarantee to the CBK project.

Finance Secretary Jose Isidro Camacho, however, denied this saying that the current administration only did "some legal clarifications." He, however, did not elaborate on his statement.

The guarantee means the national government assumes the responsibility of paying CBK's creditors should Napocor fails to pay for the electricity it committed to buy from CBK Power.

Not that the CBK project does not deserve any guarantee, but according to the provisions of the BOT law, unsolicited proposals such as that of Impsa, are not entitled to any government guarantee.

A similar case is that of Philippine International Air Terminal Co., the proponent of the Naia Terminal 3 project. The Piatco deal recently caused a stir when the Macapagal administration discovered that the previous administration guaranteed the loans of the project proponent even if the Naia 3 contract was based on an unsolicited bid.

In the case of CBK Power, a government guarantee was a precondition set by the lenders of a loan for the rehabilitation of the Caliraya-Botocan-Kalayaan power plants in Quezon.

GMA stance questioned

It was odd, said a former finance secretary, that the administration that has been meticulously studying all deals entered into by the previous administration had quietly approved a project as controversial and as closely identified with former President Estrada as CBK.

Unlike in the case of Piatco, whose guarantees were already firmed up when Estrada was booted out of office, the matter of CBK's guarantee was still in the hands of the justice department when the new administration took over.

The existing major shareholders of Philthead—Philex Mining Corp. and Bridgestone/Firestone Inc.—will own 24.75 percent and 13.14 percent, respectively.

The transaction was approved by Philthead's board of directors last July 12. It will be presented for ratification by the company's stockholders in a meeting on July 25.

"Philthead calls for the subscription and full payment of the new shares by way of stock offering to stockholders. The subscription of the new investor group on the Philthead shares will come from the increase in the authorized capital stock," the disclosure said.

"In case the new shares will not be adequate for the subscriptions of the new investor group, the balance will be taken from the other stockholders of the corporation," it added.

The investor group will transfer its 61.35-percent stake in Net Curricula to Philthead for P135.4 million. ATR Kim Eng, for its part, will transfer its 10 percent stake in LBC Global also to Philthead.

The cost of acquiring these two assets will exceed Philthead's total equity by 20 percent. However, the company said in the disclosure that it would still be able to generate a cash reserve of P14.6 million for additional working capital and future investments.

Philthead chair Gerard Brimo was authorized by the board to negotiate the terms and conditions for the entry of the investor group.

Philthead stopped its tire manufacturing operations in 1994 and spun off its plant and inventories located in Sucat, Muntinlupa to MSF Tire and Rubber Inc. The property on which the tire plant was located was transferred to Sucat Land Corp.

Earlier reports said ATR Kim Eng was buying GE Life Insurance Co. Inc., the Philippine subsidiary of GE Capital International Holdings Corp. of the US.

the limited returns, (which was equivalent to Treasury bill rates at the time) because we thought we could offset these from earnings from the project's real estate side. Unfortunately, the property sector went bust and we have yet to recover," Sobrepeña said.

Sobrepeña said his group bought out Levin only when the Supreme Court upheld the legality of the BLT contract. He said the deal was reviewed by different government agencies and was probed by the Senate and House of Representatives.

Instead of being criticized, Sobrepeña said the MRT should be praised for building the project on time and within budget—a rarity in the business. The net economic benefits of the project in terms of man-hours, fuel consumption and pollution far outweigh the costs of undertaking the project. Sobrepeña said the Edsa MRT should be reviewed with the record of LRT Line 2. The transport system from Bilibid Prison to Katipunan has yet to be completed even though it was started before the Edsa MRT.

Banks want new casino

BY GIL C. CABACUNGAN JR.

THE GROUP of creditor banks that took over Subic Bay Waterfront Development Corp. has asked the state-run Philippine Amusement and Gaming Corp. (Pagcor) to put up a casino at the Subic Yacht Club, which will be the second in Subic Preport.

Subic Bay Metropolitan Authority Chair Felicitio Payumo said the creditor banks felt that a casino would help in boosting the flagging operations of the Subic Yacht Club.

An additional casino was expected to attract a more regular flow of customers at the Subic Yacht Club, which remains a popular destination for local tourists during weekends but mostly deserted during weekdays.

Payumo, however, said the creditor banks have yet to determine whether Pagcor could legally set up another casino in Subic Bay as it has already given out a license to operate a casino in the freeport to the Legenda group, owner of an upscale hotel.

The creditor banks claimed that Pagcor could run the proposed Subic Yacht Club casino while the Legenda casino would continue to operate as a licensee.

Creditor banks led by Land Bank of the Philippines took over operations of Subic Bay Waterfront from Triple V Restaurant group early this year after the company defaulted on its roughly P1 billion in loans.

Triple V owner Victor Villavicencio was forced to pay the 17 creditor banks shares of the Subic Yacht Club to prevent his prized project from closing down. Villavicencio sold Subic Yacht Club shares at P1.7 million each for individuals and P2.3 million for corporate investors.

Logo unveiled reveals sharper focus on RP commitments

BY JOEL NIGOS

JTCI Consultants (Philippines) Corp. (JICP), the Manila subsidiary of JTC Consultants Group (JTCC), was launched last night at the Makati Shangri-La Hotel in Makati City with a new corporate identity and a new logo. The company aims itself as a total service provider for all industrial and infrastructure development in the Philippines and in the region.

"In line with our commitment to the long-term business success of our customers, JTCC will actively seek to provide innovative, cost-effective and superior solutions in master planning, project design and management services," JTCC CEO Goh Song How said in his speech during the launching.

Goh said that the company would leverage on best technologies as well as attract and retain the best people so that the company will constantly meet the ever-changing needs of businesses competing in today's new economy.

He admitted that what the company hopes to achieve in the coming years is a challenging and exciting one—adding that the challenge is not only in providing the best design and management services, but to do so consistently.

"Firstly, we want to 'consistently provide' in our project deliverables. This means consistent quality, consistent schedules, and consistent cost controls," Goh said.

He said JTCC welcomed repeat customers and said it is equally committed to the long-term success of its clients.

"We will constantly outdo ourselves and offer the best solutions to meet the ever-changing needs of today's business," Goh stressed.

Goh also reiterated that as part of its business focus, JTCC would emphasize on its expertise in consultancy work for large-scale industrial parks and in specialized industrial buildings.

"We shall focus on key markets in the region such as the Philippines and build a name for ourselves as the consultant to be looked up to in this business," he said.

Goh also enumerated three strengths that JTCC will bring to customers.

First, JTCC will provide comprehensive one-stop service, from technical feasibility study, master planning, design, engineering to on-site project management.

Second, JTCC boasts of a diverse in-house resource base of 438 professionals and supporting staff, many of them with more than 20 years of experience, and backed strongly by an established global network.

Third, JTCC has a superior track record in delivering on numerous projects in Asia which fully demonstrates the company's commitment to consistently meet the high standards of global customers.

Goh also said that the company looks forward to enjoying the challenges ahead and identified the twin pillars of success that they wanted to achieve: to deliver superior project designs and services to clients and to sustain a healthy and growing bottom line for its shareholders.

For his part, JICP president Foong Kok Meng said in his address that along with the Philippine subsidiary, the company "aims to be a leading consultancy that offers its customers innovative project design, management and related services for infrastructure and real estate developments globally."

JICP president Foong added that JICP will be fully-backed by its parent company JTCC in their local operations, be it in manpower requirements or full financial backing to undertake large-scale projects.

"JICP is also keen on working closely with local consultants (so we could) share our expertise and experiences; build new capabilities and partnerships; and responsively undertake new projects," Foong said.

JTCC, formed through the merger of JTC International's consultancy arm and the Technical Services Division of JTC Corp., was incorporated on April 9, 2001 in Singapore.

TRANSFORMING industrial landscapes and building large-scale industrial projects requires an untarnished track record. The success and the immensity of a company's previous projects measure its true worth.

The accomplishments of JTCC Consultants Group (JTCC) and the projects in which it is engaged in right now speaks of how much JTCC can do and how far it is willing to go.

Atlas

Q. Why is a book of maps called an atlas?

A. In Greek mythology, Atlas was one of the Titans, a race of giant gods who defied the gods of Olympus. As punishment for his part in the attempt to overthrow the chief god Zeus, he was condemned to support the heavens on his shoulders for the rest of his life. The word atlas came to be used to refer to a book of maps after a drawing of Atlas was included in the title-page of a collection of maps published in the 26th century by the Dutch map-making pioneer Gerardus Mercator.

For the Record. What do you suppose is the Earth's longest mountain range? The Himalayas? The Andes? The Rocky Mountains? Actually, the longest mountain range on the planet is underwater. Known as the Mid-Ocean Ridge, this chain of huge volcanic peaks extend 64,400 km (40,000 mi) from the Arctic Ocean to the Atlantic Ocean, around Africa, Asia and Australia, and under the Pacific Ocean to the west coast of North America. The Andes of South America, the world's longest land mountain range, is only about 7,500 km (4,700 mi) in length.

Past Forward. This day in 1877: The great American inventor Thomas Alva Edison recorded the human voice -- his own voice -- for the first time at his laboratory in Menlo Park, New Jersey. Edison, 30 cranked a tinfoil-wrapped cylinder against a needle and squawked in his flat, high-pitched voice, "Mary had a little lamb, Its fleece was white as now." When he reconnected the needle over the grooves scratched in the tinfoil and heard his voice played back to him, the phonograph was born.

WORD WATCH

Boses: from the Spanish voz (plural voces), "voice."

Redefining bingo with TED

THERE is now a new bingo gadget which may eventually replace the old paper card system and is bound to "excite" bingo aficionados across the country. This was according to Mega Gaming Systems, Inc. The company is set to launch TED - a sleek, state-of-the-art and revolutionary bingo gadget-today, July 18, at the Go Go Bingo Hall in Ever Gostesco Mall-Cainta. Exclusively manufactured by US-based GameTech International and distributed locally by Mega Gaming Systems, TED is set to stir the local bingo playing arena. At first glance, TED - which measures 5" x 10" x 2.5" and weighs just over a pound - seems intimidating. Resembling a larger version of a calculator, TED has a clear monitor and a numerical keypad. For big-time bingo players, TED actually allows a person to have as many as 400 cards all at the same time. This capability provides the player with the opportunity to play more and win more. Aside from Ever-Cainta, the TED will be available soon at Ever-Commonwealth and Grand Central in Caloocan City. The TED is also currently being used by avid bingo players at the Bingo Bonanza and Robinsons Galleria Mall in Ortigas.

'To stay or not to stay' is programmer's dilemma

BY TITA DATU PUANGCO

I AM a 24-year-old software programmer. I am quite content with the challenges and learning opportunities in my current work. I have good friends at work and I generally enjoy life with my family. However, the events in the past months in the country (dirty elections, Abu Sayyaf, kidnappings, etc.) have started to bother me. Since there are many chances in my field to work overseas, I wonder whether I am better off working abroad. One side of me wants to contribute my talent to our country but the other part of me is urging me to think of the future and work abroad. Please give me advice.

Bewildered Programmer

I am sure a lot of our readers can relate to your experience. Clearly, there are no easy answers. This is the age of globalization. As Marshall McLuhan introduced back in the sixties, his prediction of a "global village" is now a reality. One night, while I was watching CNN, I saw the tearful scene of the relatives of hostages beheaded by the Abu Sayyaf. The same footage was seen by my friends in the US and Europe at almost the same time.

Globalization has its benefits as well as its downside. What is good is that the use of technology is encouraging rapid sharing of ideas and attitudes around the world. People are tending towards greater unity, less of the closed insular thinking and greater openness to other people and cultures. Young people today have greater opportunities to explore the world. You have choices. As one of my children would put it, one can choose "to be a small fish in a big pond or to be a big fish in a small pond." Your choice now is: do you want to contribute as a Filipino to your country or do you want to contribute as a global person to another country?

Contribution

Two years ago, after graduating from the university, my daughter sought the answer to this same question. On her own, she decided to study and work in a European country. She learned the language in three months and started to become financially independent. She enjoyed plenty of learning opportunities in a job that challenged her creativity. Thanks to the new technologies of e-mail and text messaging, she was never really far from us. She thoroughly enjoyed her stay and took as well the leisurely vacations of people in Europe. Then, towards the end of last year, after the expiration of her contract, she was offered a renewal which she did not accept. She understood in her heart that she belongs here. She wants to contribute to the development of our country.

Coming back, she realized that many things are not ideal. As a young democracy (just over 50 years old), we are plagued with many problems like poverty, deteriorating quality of education, inadequate public health and, as a consequence, breakdown in peace and order. But instead of bemoaning the situation, she joined up with a group of friends and professionals who have pledged all their Saturdays to teach and help upgrade education in public elementary schools through student tutorials. Instead of feeling helpless, they decided to become helpful. They realized that there are no short fixes. Idealism and vision can only come from commitment, sweat and hard work.

Sufferings

Recently, I received a letter from a Chinese-Filipino who migrated with her parents to Canada. She works in a job that she thinks is way below her talents and abilities. Everyday, as she drives to work, she keeps thinking, "What if I go back to the Philippines?" Her letter made me realize that truly there is no paradise on earth. Wherever you choose to live or work, life will always be a combination of joys and sufferings. One cannot escape from suffering; it is part and parcel of the human condition.

Our choice is what combination do we want? When one goes on vacation in the United States for example, one cannot help but be impressed by the economic progress of relatives. Everything they want materially is there. And yet what is the trade off? Some couples barely talk to each other or to their children. Couples work ten hours a day with barely enough time to rest their weary bones. Strained relationships and divorces are prevalent.

Spiritual goods

Here, we have all the problems we cited earlier. But what do we have? Not much in material goods, but we have rich oil wells of spiritual goods. What a blessing for example that in Makati City, there are more than a dozen churches, chapels and buildings where you can catch mass or pay a visit to the Blessed Sacrament on ordinary days and find rest for your soul. Then on weekends, one can spend time with family and friends over lunch or dinner. And of course, the opportunities and initiatives to help the poor and the needy are plentiful.

So in essence, your choice will reflect very much what you value, how you measure success and the lifestyle you want to live. One interesting book on lifestyles or subcultures is "The Cultural Creatives" written by Paul Ray and Sherry Ruth Andersen. The authors talk of three lifestyle streams and subcultures in America: the traditional, the modern and the cultural creative.

Lifestyle streams

The moderns believe in a technological economy that is reshaping the face of the globe. They are the people who accept the commercialized urban industrial world as the right way to live. Their most important values are: making or having a lot of money, climbing the ladder of success with measurable steps towards goals, looking good or being stylish, having lots of choices, and supporting economic and technological progress. Usually, they are flaky about inner or spiritual life, they believe that they have the right to be entertained by media, they treat the bodies like machines. Either big business or big government knows best.

The traditional, on the other hand, have a general lack of interest in politics. Their key values revolve around men dominating family life and conservatism.

They believe that their fundamentalist version of religion must be upheld. Country or small town life is more virtuous than big city life. They fend off the intrusive modern world that they do not understand. They generally want black and white categories that offer a feeling of certainty. They look to the past for a comforting way of life.

Cultural creative

The emerging subculture is the cultural creative. They buy more books and listen to classical radio more than watch television. They are big consumers of arts and culture. They are systems thinkers, patrons of whole process thinking. They buy only what is authentic in the marketplace. They are careful, well informed shoppers who do not buy on impulse, so they have no financial problems. They lead cultural innovations rather than technological ones. They possess pro-environment values and embrace voluntary simplicity and spirituality. They believe relationships are more important than financial materialism and success. They are optimistic about the future and are not cynical about politics. They want to rebuild communities.

Decide which of these lifestyles or subcultures reflect best who you are and what you believe in. Then, using your heart and mind, ask yourself which one will allow you to live your values and give you happiness. Then, you will know whether you want to stay here or live abroad.

Decision time

If you choose to go abroad to work, then make an informed choice. First, make a listing of all the places where you want to work and live. Then, research on the characteristics of each of these places. Ask your friends or relatives who live in those areas to provide you additional information.

ILLUSTRATION BY STEPH BRAVO

Make a list of the things you like best and a list of the things you dislike best. Then, try to match your criteria with the information of the places where you want to work. Choose the top three places you would like to explore. When job offers come your way or if you choose to proactively seek out jobs, then you would have greater certainty of success in finding opportunities in the countries or places where you want to work.

But personally, as a culture creative, I remain optimistic about the Philippines. We hope that the young continue to be steadfast in their beliefs and idealism to face rather than escape the seemingly grim realities of today. We continue to hope that our politicians will espouse a "new politics," rise above their petty self-interest and concern themselves with the common good. At the same time, let us try to influence who and what we can within our sphere of influence so that politics alone does not become the sole driver of the future of this country.

Psychotherapy skills tame office 'characters'

BY BLAIR AGERO

MY exposure in psychiatric clinics has enabled me to understand different extreme personality types. But my shift from the "therapeutic environment" to the corporate world has forced me to utilize almost, if not all, my therapeutic attitudes to the limit. I have been introduced to and dealt with "characters unlimited" in the office, which I found more surprising than the ones in the sanitarium. The saying "fact is stranger than fiction" is true in this case. This is a cliché, but you may find yourselves mingling with similar characters and so I share how I pulled through amidst this office environment.

Here are some of the personality types I encountered:

• Paranoid—I had this officemate who "looks over his shoulders" rather too often. He "minimizes" all documents on the computer screen and manually shreds all of his scratch papers, tearing them to bits and pieces. And all he does are marketing proposals. And they all have templates. I once asked him the reason behind this obsessive-compulsive behavior and he answered me with, "They're confidential." So, what am I, an outsider? Later on, he confessed that he doesn't like others "copying" his work. Yeah right! Like I would want to get a dose of English atrocity.

Deal with paranoid people like this character in a matter-of-fact way. They usually think you're up to something behind their backs and would misinterpret your genuine interest in the things they do or your offer to help as something else. So, stay distant and yet still professional. And stop looking at their work unless they request you to. The proper attitude to this type: passive-friendliness.

• Egotistical—There's this officemate of mine who constantly fishes for compliments from everyone, especially the boss. He thinks his opinion (and his alone) is always correct. He loves to be adored and wanted at a level that might intoxicate you. He argues and makes an issue on just about everything to show how smart he is (when actually he isn't). And if you don't agree, he'll project his behavior to you.

People like this character love themselves too much and want to be pampered all the time. If you want to get along with egotistical people, it's easy—just rub their egos a bit. Praise them! But if you want to make them shut up, slight them like muk-ing a contrary remark to what they're bragging about and then hype it up a bit and say it's the latest research finding. That is sure to stun them even for a moment. If they are stunned, they're probably not half as smart as you.

• "Deadmatic"—Back in the clinic, I had a co-therapist who comes in, works and leaves at the end of each day never minding the world around him. He doesn't neglect his job, but he doesn't care much about whatever is happening in the clinic either. I made an effort to have lunch with him and he started to open up. The following days after that, I didn't have to use the ouija board.

People like him are almost totally oblivious of their environment and goings-on. Just let them be and you'll go well together. But if you want to really be symbiotic and productive with them, active-friendliness is a sure-fire way to successfully deal with them.

• "Pabida"—A supervisor in an office I worked in before was just super! Sometimes I see him in a red and blue spandex suit while he fixes something.

He takes in all the credit for a good idea that he just "stole" from a subordinate. He makes almost everyone in that office thinks he can do everything. Well, maybe he could. But come to think of it...nah! To prevent him from getting credit for my ideas, I had him "note" my ideas on paper before I submitted them to our superior. That was just a polite way of showing that those were my ideas!

He represents the kind of people who are always the "heroes"—or so they think. They are akin to egotistical maniacs. Only, they are subtler (now that's an understatement). Just treat them like the heroes they think they are. But if they really are not, then go ahead and burst their bubble. It's perfectly fine. The ideal attitude towards this type: matter-of-fact.

• Bossy—I had a graphic artist who was supposed to take orders from me, but I ended up taking orders from him. He asks me questions with a "tone" and always answers mine rudely. But I am not the one to be bullied around. No way! What I did, I "reflected" all his ghastly behavior back to him with a refined flair. Soon, he was following me.

He is a type that you should be most watchful of. This bossy type could strike you from a distance and leave you drained of energy. They could pinpoint all those little details that would make your ego shrink to microscopic proportions. The proper attitude to people like him: kind-firmness. You could still be kind to them and yet maintain that level of dignity by being firm about your viewpoint. Show them!

• Underdogs—There was this other graphic artist in the department who sat staring at his monitor all day, barely speaking. With his earphones almost glued to his ears, he barely utters a word. He just mumbles to himself. He only speaks when the boss or someone asks him questions. He looked very unassuming. I was surprised when I found out that he was an art director for a well-known in-flight airline magazine aside from his previous art directing stints for agencies and leading broadsheets.

This person belongs to the almost-autistic kind. But they may have more up their sleeves than you think. So the general rule is just treat them nice. Who knows, they might be your superior the next minute you turn around. It's a good thing I was nice to that graphic artist from the very beginning.

The office houses a lot of different personalities and characters that go beyond this list. And the attitudes I recommend may or may not work for you. But it all depends on your manner of execution, really. Still, it all boils down to one rule: the golden rule. So, do what you want others to do unto you. It's about time you put that one into practice. Then maybe, just maybe, you'll be on the top of the ladder of success before you even notice.

could have supported my parents and done a lot of things. My parents told me to just be patient." Her family scrimped on Mang Gil's income as a warehouse caretaker so that Tanya and Marie could go to a private school for the Deaf.

In time, Tanya came to terms "with things as they were." In fact, given what she has accomplished so far, she has more than made up for her special circumstances.

She has not forgotten her first love though. Tanya's father and sister are mounting an exhibit for her on August 26 at the Enterprise Center along Ayala, Makati. Both are painters who recently received an award of recognition from Duo Chemical. Tanya's paintings will be part of the show.

support the goals and values of the Deaf Community and share its identity as a group with its distinct interests and needs. If "deaf" connotes disability and helplessness, "Deaf" indicates developing to the full and being empowered.

"I want to help train more Deaf counselors and teachers who will promote the interests of the Deaf," Tanya says. "My vision is to establish a mental health center for the Deaf."

Recently, the Gallaudet University in Washington offered Tanya a two-year master's scholarship in Mental Health Counseling (she did not apply for this scholarship). Gallaudet is the school for the Deaf that is as prestigious as Harvard. Her scholarship at Gallaudet may be a way to that vision.

Her colleagues at St. Benilde hope that if she finishes the two-year course, she can help develop a curriculum for counseling for the Deaf (St. Benilde offers a Bachelor's degree on Applied Deaf Studies as well as non-degree programs for Deaf students, such as accounting, bookkeeping and sign language).

This remains an "if" because while the scholarship fully covers Tanya's two-year tuition and airfare, she will need funds for board and lodging, books, health insurance and other student fees. Colleagues and friends are raising funds to help Tanya go to Gallaudet. Sponsors so far include Presidential Husband Mike Arroyo, who gifted Tanya with a P100,000 check. More help is still needed.

Coming to terms

In the early years, there were moments when Tanya rebelled against her shadow. "I felt depressed and blamed my parents for my being deaf," she recalls. "If I were a hearing person, I

Procrastination distorts your future

SOMEDAY. One day. If. Tomorrow. In the future. Next time. Bahala na. May bukas pa. Saka na. When you often use these words in your life, then you are habitually wasting your time. This time waster is commonly known as procrastination. Procrastination is postponing for the future what you can do now.

It is also symptomatic of a lack of direction and planning in your life. It signals that you have no clear priorities and that you are less than determined and committed to whatever you are doing now. When you postpone doing something, more often than not, it never gets done.

Nobody's job

This brings to mind a favorite poster of my former training assistant, Karen Castro, entitled "That's not my job." It goes:

"This is a story about four people named Everybody, Somebody, Anybody and Nobody. There was an important job to be done and Everybody was sure that Somebody would do it. Anybody could have done it but Nobody did it. Somebody got angry with that, because it was Everybody's job. Everybody thought Anybody could do it, but Nobody realized that Everybody wouldn't do it. It ended up that Everybody blamed Somebody when Nobody did what Anybody could have done."

Karen is now in Ilocos Norte and is happily managing and teaching at her pre-school. Without giving it a second thought, she followed her heart and went home to her family. To this day I've not removed the poster from my office to serve as a reminder when I get the tendency to postpone doing something.

By Moje Ramos-Aquino

When you postpone doing a task no matter how menial, you cramp your style. You push yourself to the wall. You don't give yourself a choice. You put yourself in a box and you limit your mobility. You unduly put pressure on your heart. You put a burden on your mind. Sometimes, you even spend sleepless nights over it. You are lulled into a restless mindset that postponing doing a task will make it less difficult or it will solve itself or simply go away and be forgotten. Wrong.

When you postpone doing a task, it becomes bigger and more difficult to do because you are now running against the nature of time. The postponed task becomes less attractive and more burdensome. You will have the tendency to further postpone it or totally junk it. Whatever good results may come from it is diminished in value because it might have outlived its usefulness.

Moments of regret

To continue our Workshop on Living Life On Time to Achieve Life Plans, let's have a little exercise. Think back and write down those moments when you were regretful and sad about life. Don't continue reading until you have done this.

I am sure those times of regrets and sadness were caused more by your sins of omission or postponement rather than by what you did with all honesty and sincerity. Doing something without integrity is also a form of postponement like when you do something for the sake of doing it and not because you really wanted to do it. For example, you are an accountant and you simply do your usual debit and credit entries notwithstanding some doubts in your mind. Then, after submitting your report, you need to spend more time to redo your work.

In your job, to postpone doing something is considered a very bad attitude towards your work. It could derail you from ascending the ladder of success. Nobody wants to work with somebody who does not finish a job.

Mistakes

It is all right to make mistakes. It is from our mistakes that we learn most. When you do something right, you are overwhelmed by your achievement and do not have the time and energy to pause for some review and reflection. When you make a mistake, you normally analyze what happened and thereby, learn from the experience.

As the saying goes, it is better to have loved and lost than never to have loved at all. When you kiss the one you love, you might risk getting slapped or there is an even chance of getting kissed in return. Try it. Also try giving your boss the pleasant surprise of finishing your work ahead of time. See that delighted expression in his or her face.

She gives counsel in a world of silence

BY MANOLITA A. GONZALES

TANYA L. de Guzman was once considered a child least likely to succeed.

At age one, she lost her hearing when she pierced her ear with the pointed handle of a comb. Instead of learning how to say "Mama" or "Dada," Tanya learned hand gestures from her parents, Gil and Arsenia. Both are Deaf, and so is Tanya's sister Marie, now married to another Deaf. "We also have a deaf dog and a deaf cat," Tanya adds in jest. The de Guzmans were their neighbors' object of pity. "If a fire broke out," they said, "this family will never make it."

However, Tanya, now 28, leads a blessed if hectic life. She is a guidance counselor for Deaf students at De La Salle University, College of St. Benilde and is the only Deaf counselor in the country. She has gone to conferences in Australia and Mexico City to "speak" on the plight of Deaf Filipinas and is now in Tokyo, Okagawa and Saporu, Japan to share more insights on the Filipino Deaf.

Guidance counselor

As full-time coordinator and counselor at St. Benilde, Tanya handles group counseling and conducts workshops for Deaf students. "Those I've counseled look down on themselves," she explains. "Some are frustrated because they cannot reach out to their hearing parents; they feel that their parents do not understand them. Because of family problems or broken families, others develop negative attitudes, become stubborn and hang out with gangs. Some are confused about their sexual identity. One slashed his wrist but survived."

CAREER Tales

She continues, "I tell my deaf students to continue analyzing and understanding themselves to improve their self-esteem. We have to help them understand what they're going through and help them have a deeper understanding of the Deaf culture."

Painting

Tanya had wanted to be a successful painter. She studied Fine Arts, major in Advertising at the Philippine Polytechnic University, with an interpreter in tow. When family resources ran out after a year, she worked her way through college by doing clerical jobs at Goodwill Bookstore and frying burgers at Jollibee.

In 1991, a nun she met while doing volunteer work in church got her as part-time catechist for the Catholic Ministry to Deaf People Inc. It was while teaching religion to Deaf students in public schools that Tanya realized that her fellow Deaf were worse off. The kids would come to her after class to pour out their problems and fears. She listened and tried her best to give them guidance.

Tanya's director at the Catholic Ministry saw her potential, assigned her to its mental health unit as peer counselor and sent her to various seminars on Deaf education and family therapy.

By then, Tanya had finished Fine Arts and found a higher calling. "I set aside my dream of being an artist to focus on the Deaf," she says. "Hardly anyone understands the Deaf. If the hearing have problems, it's twice over for the Deaf because they have to contend not only with the problem itself but also with a very low self-esteem."

Deaf women's problems

Tanya learned that Deaf women have it worse when in 1998, she went to nine provinces in the Philippines for a survey sponsored by the British Voluntary Service Overseas. The survey results were disturbing. Most of the deaf women respondents said they knew of deaf women being abused or battered; these women were willing victims because they thought it was their fault. More than 60 percent of the respondents said most fathers abused their deaf daughters while most parents kept their deaf daughters at home.

The deaf women respondents indicated that they wanted a better life. They did not think that Deaf women are better off at home than going to work. And yes, they wanted to become effective leaders in their community.

The study moved Tanya and other Deaf advocates to form the Deaf Women's Health and Crisis Center of the Philippines. The center seeks to educate Deaf women to protect themselves from violence and physical abuses, and to help them improve their lives through livelihood, education, employment and awareness.

Capital D

Tanya hopes that her work will help expand the ranks of the Deaf, with a capital D, which is how members of the Deaf Community prefer to be called. The Deaf are signers (users of sign language); they

Some of the tracks, even though the issues dealt with are overrated, are given a fresh new face by the band. "Breathing" speaks of finding oneself, being "sane again," but not exactly letting go of the world and enjoying exactly where you stand at the moment ("I am hanging on every word you say/And even if you don't want to speak tonight/That's alright with me"). "Trying" is admitting your mistakes, and hoping others will, too ("Could you let down your hair and be transparent for awhile/Just a little while to see if you're human after all"). Movie makes game even more fantastic

BY JAYVI ARUTA
2bU! Correspondent
University of the Philippines,
Manila

If you had tickets to the advance screening of one of the most anticipated movies of the year, wouldn't you brag about it? I had, and I did. Thanks to the people at AXN for giving away tickets at the Anime Festival and to 89.9's DJ Crystal.

"Final Fantasy: The Spirits Within" was hyped to the heavens, although the same goes for many stinkers (the smell of mummies, perhaps...). Does it deliver the goods? Well, the answer is not a simple yes or no. The trailer is loaded with eye-popping visuals, and suggests what seems like the generic story of a "girl who has to save the world." Regardless of what I say, this movie must be seen to be believed. I won't be a jerk and give away important plot elements. Feel free to read on. Don't read a synopsis. Even that would spoil a lot of the fun.

This movie is made entirely with computer graphics. So you say you've seen that in "Toy Story" and a couple of bug movies, but this is the first film to feature humans in the wire frame digital mode. The promo pictures were stunning, but the whole package was mind-blowing. Details such as windswept hair and ruffling clothes were quite realistic. On several occasions, I forgot that none of it was real.

Most characters have a certain lack of facial articulation, but hey, no one's perfect. Anyway, there's usually so much going on, you hardly notice. But since we're nitpicking, it's rather funny that the beautiful lead character, Aki Ross, is just about the only one with long hair. Well, maybe that helps add to the effect of her character. Though the real reason probably is that making the hair move is not an easy thing to do in animation. The computer must process all 60,000 strands of hair for each frame with Aki in it.

Game fans, used to menageries of creatures, did express a little disappointment over the ghostly, translucent red nasties that are constantly at our heroes' heels. This makes the movie more "kid-friendly" (or is that "parent-friendly"? in terms of the amount of violence. How? Can't tell you that. But try asking an animator to make you a realistic ugly, furry monster and you may get hurt. Hair is hard enough to render on a human head, much less on an entire creature's body. Ever wonder why there was no Beast in the "X-Men" movie? Aaah...

Some movies made such a big issue of special effects that the producers forgot to include a story. But when your entire movie is eye candy, you'd have to work in a story somewhere. The plot moves quickly—blink and you may miss something. It does revolve around the central theme of saving the world, and the characters are just about the standard mix for this story. The difference lies in how the twists play out and how each character is given life and personality.

The cast is composed of consummate actors like Ming-Na Wen as Aki, James Woods, Ving Rhames, Steve Buscemi, Donald Sutherland and Alec Baldwin. They all do a stunning job of voicing their characters. Some parts sound a little forced, but that can be ignored. It may be because the dialogue was recorded before the animation was created. That means the actors were doing their thing in an empty sound studio while trying to imagine how the scene would play out.

The upside to this, though, is the actors were videotaped during the recording sessions, so their digital counterparts exhibit their own physical mannerisms. You can literally point to a character and say, "Yup, that's him, all right." Sadly, it's still too hard to pretend that Baldwin's character Grey isn't a pumped-up Ben Affleck.

"Final Fantasy" gamers undoubtedly expect a lot from this movie. For them, it will thankfully be a pleasing experience. Just like in the games, there are few "useless" characters. Even the supporting players like Aki's mentor, Dr. Sid, and Grey's elite team would make you want to know them more. Forget the business side of that. It's a refreshing change to see characters woven into the story as important entities and not just unsympathetic sacrificial lambs.

The "Final Fantasy" series has a aren't a gamer or sci-fi fan, the science talk may be a little confusing. In the final analysis, the scientific jargon hardly matters.

The best thing about the movie is that it can be appreciated at so many levels. Kids would see a visual spectacle and loads of action. Sci-fi geeks will have plenty to talk about after the show. There's even room to get a little philosophical. Even though the movie maintains the games' spiritual undertones, it refrains from being preachy. One thing's for sure: "Final Fantasy" will have you talking long after you've left the theater. Careful... What you talk about may tell others just how deep a person you are.

ABNKKBSNPLAKo?!
By Bob Ong
Visual Print Enterprises

BY PAM PASTOR

A COUPLE of weeks ago, I decided to indulge in a long-neglected luxury—book shopping. Shocked at how much the prices of books have jacked up and dreading to see how much higher they would go, I started stocking up on books I loved as a kid, for the little boys I will have in the far future. These were the same books my grade school classmates had borrowed and never returned.

Squeaky shopping cart piled with Roald Dahl, Judy Blume and Lois Lowry classics, I circled the bookstore again and again till I felt dizzy. It was during this shopping spree that I first came across the slim green book in the Filipino section.

"ABNKKBSNPLAKo?!" The letters screamed at me from the cover. I almost walked away, dismissing it as another one of those ungrammatical text message joke books. But almost as if it had a life of its own, my right hand reached out and grabbed the book off the shelf. I opened the first page.

"Grade 2. Section 1. Isang araw, buwan ng Hunyo, sa isang public elementary school: Hinati 'yung canteen, 'yung kalahati ng room namin. Siguro mga 40 pupils kami. 39 lang ang upuan, at 30 lang ang ayos. Siyam ang magtitiyaga sa mga gumigawang na salumpuwit. Isa ang araw-araw na makikipag-Trip to Jerusalem. Ako 'yun."

REVIEW

Hmmm. Interesting. I turned it over. P150. Not bad, when you think about it, since your average children's book is P300.

The green book went straight to my cart.

Back at home, I had to wrestle the book from my 16-year-old brother. Among all the books in my shopping bag, it was the one he found the most interesting. He kept giggling as he read the first few pages.

Finally, I had the book to myself. I started reading—and I never stopped—that is, until I fell asleep. The next day, during my long break in school (and yes, even while in class), I kept reading. I looked like a fool, laughing out loud to the bafflement of the people around me. I didn't care. I was having too much fun.

"ABNKKBSNPLAKo?!" is a collection of anecdotes from the school life of Bob Ong, the author. It is a satirical look at campus existence—from kindergarten to college.

The topic is nothing. It's been under our noses the whole time. The language is simple and conversational. What makes the book such a hit is that it's reality. The scenes hit so close to home that they seem to jump out of the pages. Anyone—absolutely anyone, from your yaya who only finished first grade to your lolo who became a lawyer—can relate to his stories. Ong's dedication pretty much sums up the target audience of this book: "Para sa: mga guro, mag-aaral, dating mag-aaral, ayaw mag-aral, drop-out, kick-out, transferee, cross-enrolled at honor students."

It's very, very Filipino. The book may strike a lot of people as nothing but sheer entertainment.

Untrue. Ong cleverly sandwiched very important lessons on our educational system and the people in it between hilarious stories. Readers would have no choice but go on reading because they're already having too much fun. An ingenious way of getting people to listen.

The book is pure genius. I kept wondering to myself, why didn't I think about doing that? Just raid your memory cells, put everything down on paper—and voila! You now have a book. Then again, forget that idea. The book wouldn't be the same without Ong's sharp wit.

If you're Filipino, if you want a good laugh, if you've ever set foot in school, if you've heard of school, read the book. You'll find a kindred soul in Ong.

Just one earth-shattering question, what is a Nutri Bun?

Canned American TV shows that make viewing more interesting

BY JASON DOPLITO
2bu! Correspondent

BARRING cable channels, perhaps the most watched television station by teenagers is Studio 23. The reason for this is its program lineup, which caters mostly to young people's taste buds. For example, the station has "Dawson's Creek," a program that features four beautiful boys and girls who can discharge the most highfalutin oratorical lines in the face of their respective heartbreaks. Then there's "Charmed," featuring three young ladies with the power to cast spells, which we can only dream of having. And of course, there's "Will & Grace," the show that presents the goofy experiences of a loveless female and her gay flat mate. Recently, the channel has added more programs clearly catering to the young market. 2bu! gives its readers a rundown of some of them.

'Jack & Jill'

This show has been running for quite some time now, and so far, things haven't really moved on. Jacqueline Barrett (Amanda Peet), who's known as Jack, has just moved to New York after dumping her cheating fiancé right at the altar. While fixing up her things in her new apartment, she bumps into David Jillefsky (Ivan Sergei), who's nicknamed Jill, and sparks fly. But there's a hitch, of course. Jill is in a relationship with someone who turns out to be the woman who helped Jack land her job. But then that was before. Now, Jack and Jill are together, not to get a pail of water, but to tread the many conflicts that come their way. For example, Jack has to make a sudden career shift from toy making to photography. Then there's Jill's ex who shows up one time in her apartment. And there are also Jill's two best friends who seem to have no other problems but girls.

At first, the show was quite engaging to watch, but nothing much has been happening since and so I have lost interest. However, considering the Filipino's love for love and relationships, "Jack & Jill" has reaped fans who follow the couple's life on TV. For everyone who's interested in catching up with the series, here's something to consider: Do it fast! The show has already been cancelled in the US and it's official that no second season is coming up. And according to one website, the reason is that the "the ratings for the show were sucking canal water, big-time."

'Bette'

This show may not really be for teenagers, but they can enjoy watching it nevertheless. Starring Bette Midler, the show is pretty much a spoof of the star's real-life drama. In the show, she is a singer and actress who has to face the reality that she's getting quite old in a world where Brimey Spears and Christina Aguilera dominate. In the pilot episode, Danny DeVito comes up to her and asks her to be a guest star in his show. Bette agrees, and the next day, Danny announces to the world that she's playing his mother. Bette's husband, daughter and manager go crazy trying to prevent Bette from hearing the news. At the same time, Bette realizes that she needs some "coping up" to do, and so she goes to a plastic surgeon and exercises to death. At one point, just to prove that she's still cool, the actress does a jazz version of Kid Rock's "Bawitdaba."

Definitely, this is one show that shows a lot of promise. It's somewhat an older version of "The Nanny."

Studio 23 has more aces up its sleeves—and we're not talking alone of 'Dawson's Creek'

A LIGHTEARTED romantic comedy about love and career in New York City

"THE OTHERS." A secret society of gifted people

'Young Americans'

Having premiered two Saturdays ago, "Young Americans" is still a bit too new to be judged. But if the second episode is a sign of the things to come, then the show should better spice up its act.

The current center among the characters here is Will Krudski (Rodney Scott), a middle-class guy who gets a scholarship into the revered halls of Rawley Academy, a prestigious New England boarding school. During the premiere, the show showed quite some skin, thanks to some great thinking by the scriptwriters. In Rawley Academy and a nearby private school for girls, the new school year is marked by tradition. Freshmen and women are asked to jump in the lake in their underwear.

Other characters include Scott Calhoun (Mark Famiglietti), Bella Banks (Kate Bosworth), Hamilton Fleming (Jan Somerhalder) and Jake Pratt (Katherine Moennig). So far, Will is having problems with his longtime friend, Finn, another local boy. Finn is jealous because Will is forgetting his baseball commitments. Finn also has the impression that Will is closer to Scott, a rich kid who also happens to be Will's roommate.

On the other side of the fence, Will is not only having problems with his baseball, but also with his rowing commitments at Rawley. And he also has gotten sick of Scott, because, in his words, "You feel like you know me, but you really don't," or something like that. On yet another side of a three-sided fence, Scott falls in love with Bella who is out of his league (read: She's not rich). This doesn't spark trouble with Scott, but rather with Bella's dad, who has preconceived notions about Rawley boys. He thinks they're a bunch of users and society snobs. Perhaps to add some more dilemma to this already confusing setup, there's a cross-dressing girl, Jake, who kisses Hamilton, who later thinks he's gay when he's really not since Jake is really female. Whew!

Tune in this Saturday to find out what happens next. And oh, this series lasted eight episodes in the US.

'The Others'

This TV program has yet to premiere on Studio 23, but I hope that they do get to do that fast. I saw its premiere episode in a private screening and I must say it's absolutely fantastic. Writers and producers for "The Net" and "The X-Files" pooled their talents for this suspense thriller.

Imagine a TV series that is a cross between "The Sixth Sense" and "What Lies Beneath." "The Others" is about individuals who have extrasensory gifts and who use their abilities to help ordinary people (think Spirit Questors). The group is led by famed medium Elmer Greentree (Bill Cobbs). This secret society is trying to recruit Marian Kitt (Julianne Nicholson), who has been having several terrifying experiences with a ghost who died in her dorm room. At one point it showed up at, where else, their bathtub! Later on, they solved a mystery of a dead old man who wanted to give something to his living wife.

The director of this film has a similar style with M. Night Shyamalan ("The Sixth Sense"), making this series more like a movie crammed into an hour.

To Studio 23, please show this series at once!

BETTE Midler stars in her own comedy show.

My seven days with the iBook

BY PAM PASTOR

INE look and I was in love. Who can forget that sleek exterior, the white polycarbonate case glistening in the light? I cradled my new baby with utmost care. Yes, I have a new baby—the Apple iBook. Before you start cursing me for my good luck, allow me to bring you (and me) back to reality.

It's not mine. It was lent to me for a week of testing. I will be saying goodbye to the iBook in barely a week. We will be together for seven measly days.

Day 1

As promised, the iBook was in the car's back-seat when Mom picked me up from school that Tuesday night. I kept running my hands over the box. To say that I was excited would be a great understatement. I couldn't wait to get home.

After what seemed like an eternity, I flopped onto the bed and took out everything from the box—the adapter, the CDs, the manual, etc. Then, there it was. Resting in its styrofoam nest was the iBook in all its 500 MHz glory. I opened the laptop and exhaled s-l-o-w-l-y. Wow.

After a few seconds of gaping, I came crashing down to reality.

Turning the iBook on was like venturing to an unknown land. As a loyal Windows nut, I felt completely clueless. No, correct that. I was completely clueless. What to click, what to click, I muttered under my breath. What the hell, here we go, I thought to myself, as I took the OS plunge.

Despite the many differences, figuring out how to use the iBook wasn't all that difficult. Turned out that Apple has created a virtual Microsoft office to service its Windows-trained users. Good for me.

The first thing I opened was the Word for Mac software, which I used to begin typing the first few sentences of this article.

The version I was going to review was the base model with CD-ROM (P78,488) and 64 MB of RAM. More expensive versions come with DVD-ROM players (P87,588), CD-R/CD-RW (P93,788) drives or the DVD-ROM/CD-R/CD-RW drives (P111,888).

The iBook I used was powered by OS 9.1 but the whole package includes a CD for an OS X upgrade. It was also powered for Ethernet and wireless networking use.

My mom, who has always been only mildly interested in computers (another great understatement), curled up next to me and said, "Anak, can I touch it, please?" And she gleefully prodded the keys with her index finger.

My uncle, who lives three floors above us, rushed down for a look, too. His penchant for making home movies made his fascination for iBook's iMovie feature no big surprise.

With this feature, you can edit clips that you've taken with your digital video camera and turn them into movies by adding transitions, animated titles, visual effects and a soundtrack. You can then export the finished project back to your DV camera or turn it into a QuickTime file that you could share with your friends.

Another feature that captured my uncle's fancy was the "speakable" commands, which is something we still have to work on. It was hilarious to see him bellowing at the laptop, "Empty trash!" only to be completely ignored.

When I finally got time alone with my baby, I decided to check out its iTunes feature. I started listening to Chapter 1 of the fourth book in the "Harry Potter" series and the Barenaked Ladies. Although the new iBook has two speakers (the old iBook only had one), the sound could still be a little louder.

After trying out a few other features, I de-

Double play on glimpse of our past

BY VERONICA B. DE LUNA
AND AILEEN J. LOPEZ
2bU! Correspondents

A TRIP to the movie house these days does not only mean watching a film. Paying P50 or more does not only entitle you to a movie ticket but a chance to appreciate a highly improved "surround sound system," a clear wide screen, ergonomically designed chairs with convenient cup holders and snacks from theater boys roaming around as well. And when you step out of the cinema, you have the whole mall to enjoy for the rest of the day.

But movie houses are not just to be found in upscale malls. Off-mall movie houses still exist, which feature second-run films at lower-priced tickets. Recently, we decided to check out two "second-run" and "double-run" movie houses in Quiapo.

It was a scorching Tuesday afternoon when we checked out these cinemas on Quezon Boulevard. We zeroed in on a signage of Globe Cinema, which has lost its luster probably due to the emissions from jeepneys speeding by. The movie house is situated in an old building, a stone's throw from Quiapo Church. Street hawkers on sidewalks sell stuff from cellular phone cases to boy band posters. Establishments selling steaming goto and mami and buy-and-sell booths stand next to the cinema.

The movie house is like a spacious, stylish '50s mansion with wide wooden stairs. We had been standing there for a long time when we heard a woman beside the ticket booth call out to us, "Ano yon?" We explained that we were writing an article on old movie houses, and we asked her if we could feature this one. She didn't answer right away and warily looked at us. Sensing her hesitation, we assured her that we were not from City Hall. Upon hearing this, she readily agreed to answer our questions.

Built in 1956, the cinema was originally owned by Americans who sold it later to some Chinese businessmen. "Dati first-run cinema 'to," she said, looking a little pensive. But with the proliferation of mall theaters, she explained that it became increasingly difficult to keep up with them so the owners resorted to showing second-run movies. They would have to wait several months after the movie's first run before they could show it. So ticket prices were markedly reduced: P30 for balcony and P25 for orchestra. For the price of one ticket, moviegoers also got to see another film, thus the term "double-run."

It was a slow day as only a few people bought tickets on the day of the interview. She laughingly replied, "Hindi, ganyan na lang talaga ngayon." However, when asked how much they usually made in one day, she clammed up, saying she was not allowed to disclose such information, otherwise, she would lose her job.

Second-run actors

We bought our tickets and proceeded to the balcony section with Manang following closely behind, flashlight in hand. Two big curtains covered the entrance to the balcony. We were greeted by a blast of hot, rancid air from giant electric fans making it almost difficult to breathe. The stench of the comfort room was terrible. We sat on the edge of regular folding theater seats upholstered in cracked synthetic leather while clinging to our bulky bags and constantly peering through endless rows of sagging seats with tattered covers. A shirtless guy was jolted in his seat when the flashlight beamed in his direction. The movie house was showing "Phantom of the Opera" and a Pinoy nude flick whose lead star is a has-been heartthrob who has seen better celluloid years. With occasional vertical white lines appearing on the screen (proof that the film had already been shown a few times in first-run cinemas) and the projector clicking behind us, we felt like we were transported to another time when films were only a pastime. Onscreen, Julian Sands was getting a bestial fix from a swarm of rats that were climbing all over him. We fidgeted in our seats. The movie was appropriate to the theater's seedy environment. Meanwhile, our guide was comfortably ensconced in her chair and appeared to have fallen asleep.

The orchestra was a bit cramped, its seats smaller and closer to each other, where more people were seated. At the end of the English language film, the Pinoy flick immediately started without intermission. While it was showing, people were milling about, looking at us, probably wondering what two wide-eyed women were doing—one of them with a camera hanging from her neck—standing awkwardly and looking as though they had been thrown into the lion's den. We worried for a minute that we would be harassed by one of the men milling around. We searched for other women but couldn't find any. We decided to leave.

We passed by the ladies' rest room and decided to check it out, too. Interestingly, it resembled the comfort room of an equally old and legendary Chinese restaurant on Banawe Street in Quezon City, which is still famous for its mami and mammoth stopao. The large shutters opened to the street outside and the sunlight streaming through it momentarily made you forget that you were inside a movie theater. As an afterthought, we asked Manang if their customers were usually men. The answer was yes. She hastened to add that a couple of years back, when they still had air conditioning, colegialas would come accompanied by older men who would later be seen handing out a wad of bills right in the cinema's lobby. "Bale, pang-matrikula na nila 'yon," she explained.

Surviving the times

Across the street from Globe is Times Theater, built in 1936. Romulo Oporto has worked there as a security guard for 28 years. Living up to its name, the theater has literally survived the times, from "peace time" after World War I to the Japanese occupation, to World War II and the recent political upheavals. Originally owned by Don Ramon Araneza, it was transformed into a garrison for prisoners during the Japanese occupation. "Dati, narra pa yung mga upuan, parang sa simbahan. Pero maliban do'n, wala nang nabago dito," Mang Romulo recalls. He obviously takes pride in having witnessed Times' better years. "Nagsu-shooting pa nga si Dolphy dito nung araw," he says. His enthusiasm rubbed off on us so we inspected the wall paneling. It was made of narra, rich and deep brown in color, polished and gleaming with age. It reminded us of vintage wine. Apparently, the building had been spared from the bombings during the war. The marble floor is still intact. We squinted to look for even a tiny crack; there was none. The steel, accordion-style gate blackened by soot and grime has been stripped of its original red paint but it's well-oiled and functioning the way it did more than half a century ago.

Unlike Globe Cinema, Times has managed to maintain its air conditioners. It's also cheaper (P25 for lodge/balcony; P30 for orchestra). Inside, the air was damp and chilly. This time, we didn't have to pay as Mang Romulo was only too happy to show us around. The place was packed; rows and rows of heads were illuminated by a beam of light flickering from the projection room right above us. It was showing "Castaway" and a foreign bold flick, which PATRONS pick out movies they can watch for only P25.

Forget surround sound, Taters and ergonomics. Two brave 2bU! correspondents check out the grimy cinemas of Quiapo easily drew an SRO crowd.

We saw a middle-aged couple enter. We learned from Mang Romulo that their customers ranged from entire families to coeds who came in groups. "Syempre, nagtiipid na sila ngayon. Magkano ba ang sine sa SM? Singkwenta, mahal na yon," he explains. Despite the steady stream of customers, Mang Romulo is still not optimistic about the future of the Times theater and other second-run cinemas today. He points to pirated compact discs as the main cause of the movie houses' slow death. With the availability of pirated video cassettes sold at very low prices, some people go to Quiapo only to buy the latest movies on VCD, which they can watch in the comfort of their homes.

We thanked Mang Romulo as we prepared to leave. We looked at Times one last time and saw beyond the grime and soot the grandeur and beauty of its walls, its sweeping staircase and the baluster with its intricate latticework. We have let these grand old movie houses rot and die, carrying with them part of our distinct heritage.

My seven days with the iBook

Day 2

Wanting to get to know my new friend better, I went online and tried to find out everything I could. I went home armed with a thick sheaf of papers full of information on the "iBook," as some people have gotten around to calling it.

When I got to the house, without even changing my clothes, I grabbed the iBook and settled back with it. I love my old desktop with a passion, but being able to bring the laptop to any part of the house is a major bonus for me. That night, I watched old episodes of "Friends" in the living room while playing with the laptop.

Switching from my trusty old mouse to the trackpad was a breeze. In fact, the trackpad seems to be more "obedient" than my old Microsoft friend.

My brother wanted to paw on it—I put my foot down. He settled for borrowing my silver fuse earrings instead.

I am falling more and more in love with the iBook. And, in the United States, a lot of people have, too. I'm not surprised. There's more than enough reason.

Day 3

The iBook has a perfect theme for me—Grape Mission. My wallpaper is purple, my scrolls are violet, my highlights are lavender—everything is just perfect.

The default resolution—1,204 x 768—might be a bit too small for people with poor eyesight but it was great for me. Oversized fonts and extra large icons just don't seem to go well with the svelte icebox. Thank God for my good eyes.

I tried to create a PowerPoint presentation about my website and I began my school paper on "human interest." The iBook was becoming more and more useful.

Day 4

Since the iBook has been reputed to be the "backpack" laptop and since its highest selling point is its portability (meaning it can take a few bumps here and there and promises to be impact-resistant), I decided to give it a test. A major one.

Feeling a bit nervous, I got one of my sturdier backpacks—a blue egg-shaped one—and slid the iBook in. Its compact size (11.2" x 9.1" x 1.35") makes it an easy fit. It's only slightly larger than a piece of short bond paper.

Then I began my difficult commute from Manila to Makati—three jeepney rides and one long bus ride, eager to see if we would survive in two pieces.

When they said that the iBook was portable, they weren't kidding. I didn't even notice the extra load on my back since I'm used to lugging around heavy books. The iBook is only 4.9 pounds, 2 pounds lighter than the old model. From the church office to my boyfriend's band practice, carrying it around was no problem.

The most difficult part of the journey was walking in Quiapo with the knowledge that I was carrying an expensive gadget on my back. But the fact that no one else knew that helped a lot.

The iBook, aside from being portable, features-packed and convenient, is quite a looker, too. Heck, even the adapter looks damn good. It turned heads everywhere. Appeal-wise, it is a hands-down winner. My boyfriend practically ignored me as he fiddled with it.

Its aesthetic qualities have had an effect on me, too. The crisp snowy white may look really good, but it makes the laptop more prone to scratches. I've found myself constantly polishing the case with my handkerchief to avoid any nicks.

That night, I made my first attempt to go online using the iBook. I failed. I had no idea how to configure my prepaid ISP for Mac use. And since it was 3 a.m., calling customer service was unthinkable.

Day 5

I woke up with one thought in mind—I would go online using the iBook, no matter what it took. I made one attempt. And another. And another. Finally, I decided to ask for help. It was 1 p.m. and my ISP's customer service hotline just kept ringing and ringing. (Yes, Philworld, I'm talking about you.) Ugh. I decided to quit just before I started breaking things. I went back to using my desktop the entire day.

Day 6

My genius of a cousin, Chrissie, finally figured out how to go online. We used remote access instead of the "Get me on the Internet" link on the desktop. The 56K modem is really fast. I was way impressed.

During our last night together, my baby and I did a lot of exploring. We went halfway around the world. We played games at coffeebreakarcade.com, posted in the threads at pinoyexchange.com, sent e-mail to friends, researched, watched movie clips and visited websites that usually require ample downloading time. (That was no sweat for the iBook.)

Using QuickTime, I watched Barbie's Cradle's new VCD. The picture was sharp when using the default screen size—not really a big surprise since the iBook "supports millions of colors." But when the screen is maximized, the picture isn't as clear.

When my eyes couldn't take any more strain, I finally gave it a rest. I carefully packed the iBook up, adapter and all, and placed it back in the box, making sure it was ready to be returned.

Day 7

Before leaving the house, I bid my friend goodbye. When I got home, the iBook was gone.

I AM a "computer hoarder," says a dear correspondent. A long queue would have to form behind me before I relinquish my place in front of the PC. I guess my dear colleagues would understand if I were writing an article or anything as important. However, one glance at the computer screen would make them think of pushing me off the chair. And being true to myself, I would have to pass the blame to coffeebreakarcade.com, perhaps the greatest online game site created for people like me.

I discovered this amazing website when I had exhausted the possibilities of Internet usage. There was nothing exciting about chatting anymore. I had seen the same things on my favorite sites over and over again, and um, nudity just wasn't exciting. I typed "online games" under the search engine of Yahoo! and there appeared the amazing site together with others.

The games site is divided into six categories: Classic, Cool, Sports, Shooting, Racing and Casino.

Classic

Under the Classic lineup, there's "Who Wants to Be a Millionaire?" Supported by the official site of the famous game show, this game is easy to download and play. Instructions are user-friendly, so there's no need to "phone a friend" with this one. It's a good way to practice one's skill before joining the real deal in the local franchise show. Though the questions tend to lean toward American culture, I think the game is still good enough to spend time.

Other classic games include card games like Solitaires and Hearts, board games like Backgammon and Chess, Pinball, Puzzle and Maze (think Pacman).

The Cool game category can be a bit shallow for my taste, but it's not all nonsense. Take, for example, the game "Don't Kill Kenny," which our 2bU! chief loved so much. Here's the run-down of the game: dear Kenny of "South Park" is under attack by friends who have suddenly gone insane, namely Cartman, Kyle and Stan. The player must help Kenny elude the knives being thrown at him by controlling the mouse. According to the site, you shouldn't kill Kenny because "he is too young to die." A bit stupid, yes, but this game, and others under the category, can generate a few laughs.

If you want a bit more of a challenge, try the Shooting category, which has the Tank Hunter game. The effects of this game are pretty okay as you are given a three-dimensional perspective of your surroundings. Your goal is to complete as many missions as possible by meeting the criteria given by the computer. As the game suggests, you are to hunt down "Super Tanks," which can be mean cheaters at times.

Shooting bugs

Other games include Bugs (where you shoot, well, bugs), Pinkslip Panic! (where you shoot memos at workers whom you wish to terminate) and Burning Metal 3D (which looks like a promising game, though I haven't played it because it takes ages to download.)

The Sports category is probably my most favorite site probably because of its Tennis game. I discovered it at the height of the Wimbledon tournament, and so I imagined myself as Goran Ivanisevic. If you have the Macromedia Shockwave, this game, as well as the other games supported by Shockwave, is a breeze to download. You are given a choice to play either two players: a male and female. The female (in this game only) moves quite slowly, so it's better to select "male."

The instructions are easy to follow, and once you get the hang of controlling your player, it'll be easy to lose yourself in the game. Here's a bonus: your opponent is no cheater. He's not too hard to engage, but not too easy to beat, either. So that makes the game even more enjoyable.

I've also tried Board'n, in which you take to the streets on your skateboard as you do some stunts while jumping over obstacles. What can I say? I've never completed a course. Perhaps you can try taking on this one. The Bowling game can be a bit boring and the same goes with the Snowboarder. If you're a fan of football, hockey and basketball, there are specific games for you.

Racing game

Another game that helped me overcome boredom was Gamers Race 3D. It's a racing game that put not only my hands and fingers to extreme exercise, but my ability to spew out cuss words as well. Computer racers in this game can be mean cheaters, what with their ability to pop up from behind you despite the big lead you've started. But then again, it just adds up to the challenge. There are three courses for each game, and they tend to be tiring especially if you've already memorized the twists and turns of the tracks. However, the perk of this game may be in the downloading; there's a simple game you can play while waiting. And, while other games take decades to download, Gamers is ready to roar in five minutes or less.

The M&M Crazy Carts is another racing game you may find enjoying. The cute characters spun from the chocolate candies are ready to give you a fast-paced race. But it takes a while to get the hang of controlling these weenies, which is the reason why I've never gotten past Course 3.

For the gamblers out there, here's the safest way to fulfill the adrenaline rush for betting. The Casino category boasts of games like BlackJack, Roulette, Slots, Poker and Craps. You would need Java to download most of these games.

If these games still don't make you salivate, I don't know what else will. As for me, this site is so good that I'm swearing it off for a month. I've become a "Coffeebreakarcade Addict."

My seven days with the iBook

cided to give it a rest. Seems like switching from Windows to Mac would take a lot of getting used to.

Day 2

Wanting to get to know my new friend better, I went online and tried to find out everything I could. I went home armed with a thick sheaf of papers full of information on the "iBook," as some people have gotten around to calling it.

When I got to the house, without even changing my clothes, I grabbed the iBook and settled back with it. I love my old desktop with a passion, but being able to bring the laptop to any part of the house is a major bonus for me. That night, I watched old episodes of "Friends" in the living room while playing with the laptop.

Switching from my trusty old mouse to the trackpad was a breeze. In fact, the trackpad seems to be more "obedient" than my old Microsoft friend.

My brother wanted to paw on it—I put my foot down. He settled for borrowing my silver fuse earrings instead.

I am falling more and more in love with the iBook. And, in the United States, a lot of people have, too. I'm not surprised. There's more than enough reason.

Day 3

The iBook has a perfect theme for me—Grape Mission. My wallpaper is purple, my scrolls are violet, my highlights are lavender—everything is just perfect.

The default resolution—1,204 x 768—might be a bit too small for people with poor eyesight but it was great for me. Oversized fonts and extra large icons just don't seem to go well with the svelte iBook. Thank God for my good eyes.

I tried to create a PowerPoint presentation about my website and I began my school paper on "human interest." The iBook was becoming more and more useful.

Day 4

Since the iBook has been reputed to be the "backpack" laptop and since its highest selling point is its portability (meaning it can take a few bumps here and there and promises to be impact-resistant), I decided to give it a test. A major one.

Feeling a bit nervous, I got one of my sturdier backpacks—a blue egg-shaped one—and slid the iBook in. Its compact size (11.2" x 9.1" x 1.35") makes it an easy fit. It's only slightly larger than a piece of short bond paper.

Then I began my difficult commute from Manila to Makati—three jeepney rides and one long bus ride, eager to see if we would survive in two pieces.

When they said that the iBook was portable, they weren't kidding. I didn't even notice the extra load on my back since I'm used to lugging around heavy books. The iBook is only 4.9 pounds, 2 pounds lighter than the old model. From the church office to my boyfriend's band practice, carrying it around was no problem.

The most difficult part of the journey was walking in Quiapo with the knowledge that I was carrying an expensive gadget on my back. But the fact that no one else knew that helped a lot.

The iBook, aside from being portable, features-packed and convenient, is quite a looker, too. Heck, even the adapter looks damn good. It turned heads everywhere. Appeal-wise, it is a hands-down winner. My boyfriend practically ignored me as he fiddled with it.

Its aesthetic qualities have had an effect on me, too. The crisp snowy white may look really good, but it makes the laptop more prone to scratches. I've found myself constantly polishing the case with my handkerchief to avoid any nicks.

That night, I made my first attempt to go online using the iBook. I failed. I had no idea how to configure my prepaid ISP for Mac use. And since it was 3 a.m., calling customer service was unthinkable.

Day 5

I woke up with one thought in mind—I would go online using the iBook, no matter what it took. I made one attempt. And another. And another. Finally, I decided to ask for help. It was 1 p.m. and my ISP's customer service hotline just kept ringing and ringing. (Yes, Philworld, I'm talking about you.) Ugh. I decided to quit just before I started breaking things. I went back to using my desktop the entire day.

Day 6

My genius of a cousin, Chrissie, finally figured out how to go online. We used remote access instead of the "Get me on the Internet" link on the desktop. The 56K modem is really fast. I was way impressed.

During our last night together, my baby and I did a lot of exploring. We went halfway around the world. We played games at coffeebreakarcade.com, posted in the threads at pinoy-exchange.com, sent e-mail to friends, researched, watched movie clips and visited websites that usually require ample downloading time. (That was no sweat for the iBook.)

Using QuickTime, I watched Barbie's Cradle's new VCD. The picture was sharp when using the default screen size—not really a big surprise since the iBook "supports millions of colors." But when the screen is maximized, the picture isn't as clear.
